Wonder-working in making a pro-shop attractive has been demonstrated by John Keefe, pro at the Brookline (Mass.) municipal course, and formerly assistant to another master pro merchant, Roland Wingate of the Country Club, Brookline. Johnnie found that 60% of his business was done with women, so went to work decorating the shop to impress women and men alike as a smart shopping place. The ceiling is white, the floor is black with touches of gray and a "brick" linoleum rug is in the center of the room. Neat frame pictures adorn the walls.

This picture was taken last October and all the stock Keefe had left appears. He does an active business up to the time snow flies because his shop always looks like a fine place to buy.

PEORIA USES PRINTED LESSONS

By KARL SUTPHIN

FURTHER developments in high school golf teaching at Peoria, (Ill.), started last year by Horton Smith and Elmer Biggs, newly elected president of the Illinois PGA, include the interesting presentation of written golf lessons for the pupils.

Biggs was elected to fill the unexpired term of Horton Smith, who recently resigned as pro at Oak Park CC to devote his time to golf promotion work and tournament play.

This year three classes of 75 pupils each are being conducted on Fridays at the Peoria high school by Biggs, who is pro at Peoria CC, and by Art Andrews, pro at Mount Hawley CC, in cooperation with athletic director Salen Herke, Carroll Bockwitz and others of the high school faculty.

First lesson was on the grip. Each pupil was handed a mimeographed instruction sheet on the correct grip, as drawn by an art class of the school to Biggs’ and Andrews’ specifications. The second lesson was accompanied by a mimeographed sheet showing stances for the various shots. Each youngster was given two wooden tees to peg the lesson sheet into the ground for practice at home.

Sheets were labeled with an Illinois Professional Golfers Association credit line and were excellently drawn by the kids. Biggs is of the opinion that when the National PGA gets its instruction fundamentals agreed upon, this data will be of invaluable practical and publicity value to pros engaged in school instruction. The Peoria high school requires printed lessons for students and as there may be other schools with the same requirements, Biggs believes that the matter is one for concerted action by all PGA sections, inasmuch as school group instruction seems certain to extend.

Further value of the printed lessons, so the Peoria pros have learned, is that the youngsters take the lessons home after the 40-minute sessions. At home, the youngsters' parents get interested in the lessons and the golf promotion influence is spread.

Peoria newspapers have given great space to the promotion both by picture and type. The newspapers also put in a strong plug for gifts of golf clubs for the students, as the entry card the youngsters had to fill out to gain admission to the classes showed that only 4% of the applicants for group lessons had clubs. The entry cards also showed that 90% of the kids who applied for lessons never had played golf and that 75% of the golf pupils' parents did not play. Almost two-thirds of the pupils making application for lessons were girls. Attendance after the first lesson picked up considerably, and is continuing to grow at a pace that is bothering the instructing pros with the problem of taking care of the late starters.

Biggs and Andrews see in the group golf lesson demand for clubs to be used by school youngsters an eventual outlet for used clubs that should have a positive effect in the new club market by getting adult players to give away, or sell at nominal second-hand price through pros, old clubs to the beginning kids.

Peoria high school kids are going for golf strong, making the golf team match with Bloomington High feature of the sports section of its school weekly newspaper, which has won national and international awards as a top specimen of high school journalism. Class lessons are played up, and one of the kid columnists flips in a smart comment to one of the girl golf students, “more par to you.”

Social Security Act

course, that you employ eight or more persons.

But note carefully the word “wages.” Ordinarily this would be construed as representing your payroll, but to quote from section 811 of the Social Security Act, the term “wages” means “all remuneration for employment, including the cash value of all remuneration paid in any medium other than cash.” Hence, if you provide room and board for any of your employees, you must set a fair cash value on same, and this should be included for purposes of taxation in your payroll records. Take for instance your greenkeeper. Oftentimes it is customary for the club to provide living quarters for him and his family. Hence, if this is done, a proper cash value should be placed on these quarters and for the purposes of taxation included in your payroll.

One item on which a club can legitimately make a tax saving is on caddies. For instance, if it is now your custom to charge caddie fees to your members' accounts, it would pay you to change this arrangement; and although the club may furnish time cards for the caddies to punch, be sure and have their services paid direct by the members of the club instead of charging them to their accounts.

The reason for this is as follows: If the caddie fees are charged to the members, the caddie then becomes an employee of the club and his fees are considered a part of the general payroll and are, therefore, taxable. However, if the members pay the caddie direct, they are considered as independent contractors selling their services direct to the individual members, and hence are not employees of the club and, therefore, their fees are not taxable. When you realize that caddie fees each year run into millions of dollars, you can readily see that a great saving can be made by the individual club if they can be excluded from the payroll.
