balls an individual player or a golf pro will get back in return for the number of old golf balls the individual player—or the golf pro—turns in to the manufacturer.

"If the golf professional takes the position that he will return to his member a new ball for every old ball the member turns in, and he continues that policy throughout, it is obvious that the following condition could easily be created: A few members who happen to have a fairly sizable quantity of old golf balls would turn them in and in return would receive an equally good supply of new balls as the new balls were made available. Other members who are not so fortunate as to have any supply of old golf balls would have none to turn in and would, therefore, be unable to obtain any new balls. It would seem logical that these members in this class would, therefore, not be able to play golf; would lose interest in the club and, in all probability, would resign.

"Consequently, it would seem that the golf professional has a real obligation to all of the members of his club and to the officers of the club who are his employers to see to it that a condition such as just described does not arise.

"If this is the case, then the golf pro should not, under any circumstance, make commitments to individual members as to exactly how many new balls will be made available to the member who turns in some specific quantity of old balls.

Should Explain to Members

"It would seem that the golf professional should make the situation clear to each member in reply to questions that will be presented to him by these members. It seems equally obvious that if this situation is described carefully by the pro, to the members, that they will see the soundness of it and in their own interest will be only too glad to have the pro allocate the supply of new balls that he is able to obtain as evenly as possible to the entire membership so that the entire playing membership can be kept in a position to play and in that way salvage the club and keep it alive.

"These thoughts are brought forcibly to my mind because I am having reported to me from so many quarters the insistence on the part of golf professionals to know just how many golf balls they are going to get back in return for old balls they turn in and because the golf professionals report that they are making commitments to their members that they will give the member certain specified quantities in return for the old balls the member turns in.

"It seems to me that the situation is so grave and is so far-reaching that it is absolutely necessary that every individual connected with it do his share. I feel confident that if every individual does his share, a sufficient quantity of golf balls can be made available, not only for this year, but for 1943, to practically insure the maintenance of golf play and, along with it, to maintain the private clubs in existence. If this is not done, it would seem to me that it would be entirely possible for the lives of a number of private clubs to be placed in serious jeopardy."

Joseph G. Davis, Oldest Golf Writer, Dies

JOSEPH GARIBALDI DAVIS, 79, for the past 16 years executive sec. of the Chicago District GA, died April 3 in a Chicago hospital, after a 7-weeks' illness. For 25 years Joe was golf editor of the Chicago Tribune. He was born in England. He resided in Florida for a short time after coming to the U. S. and moved to Chicago in the 80s.

He was among the first to play golf in the Chicago District and did much to build the game in the midwest. He was probably the first sports writer in the U. S. regularly assigned to golf. Thousands knew Joe and loved him. He was a real gentleman sportsman. His amazing memory and extensive acquaintance accounted for keeping the history of midwestern golf complete and accurate.

Elmhurst (Ill.) CC began something other clubs are adopting. Elmhurst called one of its traps the USO trap. Every player who hits a shot into that trap deposits a quarter in a box in the clubhouse. The collection is forwarded to the USO.

A sign located not to interfere with play marks the trap.

Such a trap, with a dime or quarter penalty, might well be designated at every golf club in the United States and bring in a goodly piece of money for USO operations.
