protecting their own dealers and price structure.

Judgments vary on how to handle these situations. A few pros opine that the answer may be sectional pro co-operative newspaper, radio and television advertising on an aggressive price competitive basis. They hesitate to go all out on such policy however as they fear this may weaken the pro "top quality" reputation and bear down the entire price structure which has been built on the foundation of pros demanding the best for their trade. These fellows point out that manufacturers of quality golf goods share with the pros a tremendous stake in providing highest quality goods for golfers at reasonable profit.

With golf goods demand no longer principally limited to a quality market, the problems of merchandising balance between private, semi-private and public course pro shop outlets and other retailers will have to be solved by mutual consideration of pros and leading manufacturers, several pros declared. Their attitude is that other retail outlets for golf goods don't much care about what happens to foremost golf goods makers but the leading manufacturers and the pros have to swim or sink together.

Another delicate financial problem is serious at some private clubs, so says one of the most successful veteran pro businessmen. He says the difficulty of developing and holding a group of good caddies when kids stand around while members who could afford caddy fees drag carts, is calling for action by club officials.

Assistant Problem A Headache

In every district the assistant problem is pressing. Seasonal nature of the work, long hours, Saturday, Sunday and holiday work, and shop duties being ahead of practice and play come as shock to the young golfer who thinks it's a lot of fun at big money to be in pro golf.

Some professionals say they've had good results getting older men, either pros or amateur golfers, in their shops. Others believe the right answer is to start training boys.

What all the pros reporting agreed was that much more work had to be done by pros collectively and individually in recruiting and training desirable assistants, not only so the assistant would know what to do to serve the club's golfers properly, but would learn what he should know to eventually handle a job of his own with credit to himself and professional golf and value to his employers.

Pro Operating Costs Jump

Increase in over-all operating costs of pro departments, according to all but one pro reporting estimates for the sections, have been alarming. In the past two years at private and public course pro departments where the players get first class service operating costs have increased from 25 to 45 per cent.

One professional who is considered by many of his colleagues as the soundest businessman in his district says "The pros who, in a straightforward manner, present their club boards and employees with a realistic picture of mounting operating costs and make an effort to enlist consideration as partners in licking the problem will succeed and survive."

Another says the pro department has to pay closer attention to minor expenditures which total big at the end of the year.

The possibility of better shop layouts to save salaries of assistants and other employees is suggested by several.

The majority of the pros who commented on rising pro department costs admit they don't know what to do to solve the serious problem.

Caddies "Field Day" Gets Boost from Sports Editor

FRANK McGRATH, sports editor, Fall River (Mass.) Herald News, gave about ¾ of a page in story and pictures covering the annual Caddies' Field Day at the Fall River CC.

Pro Marty Higgins says McGrath's story not only had the club's caddies and members talking and buying papers but the strong coverage and lively detail had every other kid of caddying age in town, and the parents of a lot of them talking.

Pres. McIlwane of the club paid the members' thanks to the kids at a dinner which concluded a day of golf, driving, approaching and putting contests, scholarship and other prize awards. Interesting detail of the Fall River caddies' education is a quiz program, with any kid who can't answer caddying and golf questions Higgins asks putting a nickle in the kitty and the jackpot going to the boy who has the right answer.

McGrath's experiment in giving caddies big time treatment in his paper paid off in interest, goodwill and circulation among youngsters of caddying age, and their parents.
