well trained so that they properly and ably represent you?

What have you been planning for many years to do about your shop or any other phase of your job that you haven't attended to yet?

Write down the answers to those questions and you'll probably have some surprising facts, figures and hunches that will point directly to a considerable improvement in your job and its profits.

Show Yourself Your Job

This sort of written survey of the pro and his job, made by the fellow who knows best, may become the customary thing when college graduates are holding most of the club pro jobs. Right now the more successful professionals, regardless of the extent of formal schooling they've received, periodically examine every phase of their jobs.

The PGA assistants' schools have done a great deal in a short time to develop the procedure of looking at the job analytically and making notes to be used at work or in its planning.

One department of pro golf in which organized study has worked wonders is teaching. The best-known good teachers are better now than they were ten years ago and the average pro now is a better teacher than the average pro was ten years ago.

Teaching results are decidedly more effective, not because pupils are better qualified to be taught and to learn, but because the teachers know better how to teach.

Organizes Instruction

Ask any of the older pros who is regarded as an effective teacher and he will tell you that he really began to teach well after he had organized his own study of instruction. Now you see a number of the foremost golf instructors watching men's and women's pro tournaments, studying what gets results for the playing stars and which of these methods can be adapted to the teaching professional's pupils.

Harry Pressler, one of the great teachers, takes a sabbatical leave every year and for several months goes on the tournament circuit, observing and studying and recording what makes the player tick — or slump. Around any big tournament you will see other club professionals who have developed men or women stars. These teachers never stop learning. In most cases they know more about how and why the players happen to be playing well or just mediocre than the players do.

Averages Will Improve

Tommy Armour, who makes a study of coaching and performance in other sports in search of ideas that can be applied to golf instruction, forecasts that the next generation of average golfers is going to score much better than the average now. "They will be taught by professionals who have studied the job of teaching," Armour says.

Studying every part of the pro job may be even tougher than doing the actual work on the job. According to club pros who are top businessmen, studious examinations of what's doing in the pro department is the surest way of making more money out of the job.

"Christmas Shopping at Your Pro Shop" Campaign Starts

The sixth year of the highly successful pro shop campaign of merchandising golf gifts for Christmas already is certain to set new sales records for professionals judging from advance orders of the 1959 edition, says Joe Graffis, GOLFDOM's business mgr.

Around the “Christmas Shopping At Your Pro Shop” plan was built golf gift sales at pro shops that passed the $1,000,000 mark, according to reports from professionals who took part in the 1958 drive for Christmas business.

“Christmas shopping at other retail outlets often diverts money from pro shops when golf gifts would be more desirable from the viewpoint of givers and receivers,” Graffis says. "The Christmas campaign converts stock into cash, promotes buying of golf equipment for winter vacations and sells substantial volumes of merchandise without cutting into spring sales."

Beginning early in Sept., “Christmas Shopping At Your Pro Shop” will be sent to pros who have placed orders.

In each of the previous five years of the Christmas gift plan’s operation, professionals who delayed in ordering the pro shop sales promotion catalog couldn't be supplied. There are no late printings of the gift-buying guide!!!
