Architects being bulldozed?

a landscape license that is renewable every two years and a list of licensed compatriots, with the request that he inform the state education department of "any persons known to be practicing landscape architecture whose names do not appear on the list."

To those without licenses, in New York, a penalty of not less than $100 or more than $500 or imprisonment of not more than one year or both awaits them. It is also illegal for an architect to use another's seal unless he is a regular employee of the man holding the license.

Mitchell calls the law "ironic," because it safeguards work for building architects, land surveyors and professional engineers—none of whom has the background and experience needed to layout golf courses in accordance with the rules of the game. Mitchell notes the American Society of Golf Course Architects has failed to take a stand on the law. "I doubt if 10 per cent of its members are even aware of the situation that may deprive them of their livelihoods."

One answer, Mitchell feels, is to amend the law to include practicing golf course architects whose work has been satisfactorily rated by the United States Golf Assn.
