Turf-Vac adds distributors

Dwarf bluegrass developed
Purdue University announced that its agricultural experiment station researchers have developed a dwarf variety of bluegrass, which grows slowly and low. Named Sodco, the bluegrass is resistant to striped smut and may be cut at three-quarters of an inch to an inch in height. It is not designed, however, to withstand heavy play or traffic and would be best used on golf course fairways. Distribution of seed has not yet been worked out, but according to Laurel Meade, general manager of the Agricultural Alumni Seed Improvement Assn., Inc., certified seed probably would be available to homeowners for planting in 1970.

Systemic fungicide

Undergoes testing

A new systemic fungicide, written up in the Elm Research Institute’s Spring Bulletin, is currently being tested at the University of Wisconsin as a cure and preventive of Dutch elm disease. The proprietary chemical is a non-toxic solution, formulated by DuPont and known as Benlate. Results of previous tests conducted by the company have been sufficiently promising to warrant further testing by the university. To date, reports on Benlate’s effectiveness indicate that every reason exists for an optimistic outlook on results of final tests.
