What Are The Pros
Buying For '74?

Although pros say they will be more cautious in their buying than last year, they generally are optimistic in their projections of 1974 sales. Investment cast clubs will dominate club sales and a return to traditional colors and styles in soft goods is predicted.

EAST

NEW YORK—Asking Eastern golf club professionals to prognosticate on their 1974 buying is like asking a man carrying a heavy load for a match—their hands are full with the problems posed by 1973's badly depleted selling market.

In spite of this year's insufferable golfing weather, which left a “trail of tears” up and down the Eastern seaboard, there were still some professionals who would speculate on what 1974 would bring. Among those talking—caution is the watchword. Most Eastern professionals have lost that sense of well being that comes from putting a banner year under their belts and that induces a liberal wholesale buying climate. The invariable rhetorical answer to questions on '74 predictions runs something like this:

"After this year, wouldn't anything short of a deluge be an improvement?"

"Yes."

"But could you be a bit more specific? What does your experience and instinct tell you you may expect in '74—soft and hard goods buying trends continued on page 42H

CLEVELAND—Professionals here began buying for the 1974 season in September, but they are purchasing more cautiously than they did for 1973.

"I'm going to be more conservative in my buying," says Duff Lawrence, professional at the exclusive Canterbury GC, site of the 1973 PGA National championship.

"The economy has a lot to do with it. Members pay their dues, food and beverage bills and caddies before they buy golf clothes. Clothes are the last thing on the agenda. And when they buy, they'll get one sports coat instead of two or maybe two pairs of slacks instead of four.

"And still others, who aren't quite as clothes conscious, will wear last year's slacks," he continues.

Lawrence added that hard goods, club, bag and shoe sales, "have held their own this year, but soft goods have not gone as well as before."

While Lawrence thinks of the economy, Bob Hamrich of Mayfield CC, another one of Cleveland's more exclusive clubs, said the rain in April and continued on page 42H

SAN FRANCISCO—The buying intentions for next season by professionals in Northern California are as varied as the stocks and suppliers.

Only the two darlings of latter-day golf shop merchandising are being cited by professionals in shops large and small, rural and urban, public and private—investment cast clubs and balls with new covers and dimple patterns.

In clubs, many professionals are counting on the new boost from graphite shafts and are looking to new, usually smaller manufacturers that are supplying custom-made and individually-styled woods and irons.

Even so, one professional at a long-established private club in Oakland, believes his members are confused by all the changes in club manufacture, shafts and specialty design. He will order more traditional lines for next year.

He admits that the newer club styles are selling well in his shop, but so are the traditional. "I'm just not on the investment cast bandwagon," he says.

and the like?"

"Well," says the Eastern golf professional, "my experience tells me to expect a better selling season every season. My instinct and natural optimism tell me I should buy heavily to meet and capitalize on that expected demand. Now, so much for experience, optimism and instinct. Sales this year are teaching me to heed my newly-acquired sense of caution, so that when I look at my racks and shelves in August '74, I don't have to wonder how to make room for '75 merchandise amid all the leftover stuff."

Unfortunately, this sense of caution has led many professionals (not only in the East) to drastically reduce their buying in women's soft goods. When a professional gets stuck with holdover merchandise, women's golfwear consistently has made up the major part of what he must live with during the next season.

Asked why women's golf clothes are always the holdovers, one pro says, "Well it's not just because I always over buy or necessarily buy wrong. The woman's market has always been erratic, and golf fashions do not change substantially from year to year to meet women's appetites for the latest thing. It could be that the only way to consistently make money in women's soft goods is to pack a line of general sportswear style innovations. "My members more and more are wearing active sport clothes on the golf course. Some are even giving up golf shoes in favor of sneakers and boating shoes; so this year for the first time I'll try a more liberal assortment of active sports shirts and slacks. They're after clothes they wear for other occasions besides golf."

One professional said he made the rounds of the downtown department stores and decided to stock several of the new men's car coats with this year's wider lapels in Donegal tweed and some of the new high-style reversible trench coats and wool ties. "Many members have complained that I stock only traditional golf merchandise. One woman even said that if I'd stock some

May caused a drop of sales in his shop.

Reece Alexander, owner-professional of suburban Legend Lake CC, says that business has maintained a fairly steady pace.

The public courses are having a different problem. "Caps, hats and visors have sold pretty well," says John Peters, head man at Seneca, one of Cleveland's top public courses, "but golf club sales have dropped off drastically.

"The discount house, which advertises in the sports pages, are taking the business," he declares. "People also are buying pro-type golf balls there much cheaper.

"We get 1,500 or 1,600 players on weekends, but they're buying their equipment at the discount house.

"It's funny, but I know a man who went down to Puerto Rico and paid $5 for a golf hat and then complained about paying $2.50 up here for the same thing, but with a different decal.

"I think there is a trend now and I'll buy accordingly."

Reece Alexander, whose membership at Legend Lake is made up of high middle class, says that sales are cyclical. "It's always been like that for us," he points out. "We're just in our fourth year at our club and we enjoy moderate sales.

"Soft goods are holding their own. People are going to polyester and cotton blends more and more. Wool, of course, is out, but the doubleknits are doing well.

"We don't have a large female membership, so, of course, we don't stock heavily in their clothes," he adds.

"There aren't many people anymore who dress to kill. They wait all week for Saturday and when it arrives, all they think about is teeing up the ball, but because of this, our glove business is pretty good. Nothing spectacular, but good.

"However, I always believe if you get the traffic you'll get the business. I bought a little heavier this year and I'll probably buy about the same for next year, in soft goods anyway," he adds.

The bossman at Legend Lake had a good start this year in hard goods, but sales tailed off somewhat. "The way we began I thought it would be spectacular, especially in clubs, but it hasn't been that way," Alexander says.

In soft goods he expects to stock more in men's wear and considerably less for the women. The women seem more inclined to buy their apparel at nearby stores, but the bigger his inventory of men's wear, the more he sells.

However, he expects the prices of imported items to go even higher and cited cashmere as an example. Except as a specialty item, cashmeres have almost priced themselves out of his market.

Another private club professional, who is bullish about soft goods, expects wools to make a strong comeback for fall, based mainly on the outstanding colors and patterns available.

He is so excited about the possibilities in apparel that he has hired a former clothing store employee to help customers with selections and fit and for buying. In spite of poor golfing weather, February was the biggest month of his professional career, and much of the lift came from clothing, so it is not surprising that he plans to expand his lines, even to ties to go with the sports coats, dress shirts and street shoes he has been selling.

At the public courses, enthusiasm for soft goods seems to be waning, but the excitement over clubs, balls and shoes (and to some extent, bags) is growing.

"We're getting away from soft goods," says one public course professional. "Most of us professionals really don't know much about soft goods. It's tough to compete with the clothing stores. We should stick to clubs, balls and accessories."

He expressed some skepticism about the graphite shaft, remembering the strong demand that once existed for aluminum shafts. "The next thing you knew, you couldn't give them away," he says. He'll buy cautiously in this area.

"Socks, shoes and windbreakers are our limit now," says another public course professional. We tried one of the top apparel lines once, but the competition with the shopping centers and downtown clothing and department stores was too much."

Because of heavy play by youngsters and learners at his course, he will stock a supply of starter sets for next year, low-priced clubs to help beginners on their ways.

He's looking for good movement among the top line clubs next year and

"The past two years have not been that great and I believe a lot of it has to do with the economy," he says. "Soft goods are down and hard goods are holding their own."

Business in the Cleveland area is down somewhat in 1973, which will affect professionals' buying for 1974. The professional will check and double check quantity, but maintain the buying of quality.

anticipates a brisk business in used clubs as usual. "I try to sell people on the idea that top line used clubs are a much better buy than new cheaper clubs sold downtown," he says.

"All the clubs will be good movers next year," says one professional at a public course, who also operates several other sales outlets.

"People are not necessarily sticking with the widely known brands," he says. We've had good sales of the lesser-known clubs; actually we have a shortage of clubs." His ball buying for next year will center on those with Surlyn covers, solid construction and the new dimple patterns.

Another public course professional, who formerly carried a heavy inventory of close-outs, but has not done so for the past two years, says he has mixed emotions about club buying for 1974.

"I think the investment case popularity will continue, so that's where most of my buying will be."

In shoes, he is closing out the low-end lines below $20 and moving to leather, even in the $50 range. It may involve limiting his inventory to only one line, but he thinks quality shoes are what his players want.

And just the opposite has been observed by another public course professional. "We'll buy heavy in shoe lines that sell for under $30; that's where the market is," he says. In clubs: "We'll have to go almost exclusively with investment cast clubs; they account for 75 to 80 per cent of our club sales now."

He is also looking to special make-ups, particularly in bags, for good sales volumes, "We can't operate on the 40 per cent markup anymore. We have to buy lower to sell lower."
