

You can cover up the name
but not the Power-Bilt experience.

Reports come to us all the time that a lot of pros put the punch of Power-Bilt woods behind their annual tour winnings. Even golfers who aren't on the H&B Advisory Staff. We're proud of that kind of acceptance. It proves there's a special feel about the Power-Bilt experience. Ask your pro about Power-Bilts, the Master-Matched woods with brass behind every shot.

The POWER-BILT experience

HILLERICH & BRADSBY CO.
Louisville, Kentucky
Sold in Golf Professional Shops only.

WILLIAMS from 34D

players because they have to or they want to. They want leadership. How many times have you tried to promote some guy to more responsibility only to hear him say, "I pass." Few people want to be the boss: most want to work for somebody else.

□Eliminate cycles on your part. This is probably the most difficult part of employee relations and probably the most important. When you come to work with "gas on your stomach" it rubs off on your people. When you badmouth your business, the business usually gets worse. When you show a lack of initiative, drive, get-up-and-go, your employees will inherit those same feelings in multiples of 10. Yours is the driving force, and you're out there all by yourself.

□Hire the people who "feel" right to you. Fire them when you lose that "feel." There is no sure way to know what kind of employee anyone will make. Try them. If they don't work out, almost immediately send them on down the road. Now I know that some people will say that's not very fair, but keep in mind that your success and your other employees' success depends on a team effort. No bad apples needed today.

□Fairness is fundamental to good employee relations: fairness to the employees and fairness to the boss. You have obligations to them: they have obligations to you. A failure to fulfill on either side of the road eliminates the other side's obligations.

□Fairness on the employer's side includes an accurate picture of the job before the employee starts to work; a fair level of pay and other benefits; a job that he can handle efficiently; a potential for growth; and above all, guidance, direction, control, and security — or at least a feeling of security.

□Fairness on the employee's side includes an undying willingness to do the best job he can. No shortcuts, no short-sheeting, no laying down. The best he can possibly do.

□Praise your employees when they have earned praise. Criticize constructively when they screw things up. Most of us, by the way, handle the criticizing portion adequately, but we come up way short on the praise portion. A point to ponder yourself.

□Employees want objectives they can fulfill and accomplish. The worst thing in the world for an employee is to have him go home every night wondering what he accomplished today. Lack of objectives is the primary breeding ground of discontent.

□Employees cannot read your mind or second-guess you. Be specific, outline it, repeat it and follow it up. You are getting paid to make the major mistakes, so make them yourself. Don't palm off a mistake on one of your employees because you failed to make sure they understood what you wanted.

□And they are the backbone. If you have someone who consistently performs below par, it is your fault and only yours. You have either failed in your job or you should have fired the guy a long time ago.

Business is not selling goods and services. Business is people who buy and sell. People buy and sell from people; therefore, we have to assume that your best bullet is shot when you have the best people possible. Since you are "a person," you must sell yourself not only to your customers but first of all to your employees. If you can sell them—they should be able to sell anyone who walks in the door.

Employer-employee relations has no room for the axiom, "It matters not whether you win or lose." But we must add "how you play the game" has a major role in the final outcome. If you are the boss, be fair, be equitable, set objectives, be consistent, give guidance, exercise control, expect and demand a good job, and you will automatically determine the final score. □

PGA SHOW, WINTER EVENTS SLATED FOR DISNEY WORLD

LAKE PARK, FLA.—The 1975 Professional Golfers' Assn. winter program, which includes the national merchandise show and the seniors' championship, will be held in January at Walt Disney World, according to an announcement by PGA President William Clarke.

The merchandise show, to be held January 26 to 29, will be housed indoors for the first time in its 23-year history. More than 400 booths for over 200 exhibitors will occupy ballrooms and exhibit halls in the Contemporary Resort Hotel and the adjacent annex building.

The five traditional tournaments played throughout January will be held on the Palm and Magnolia courses in the Disney World complex.