Wine and brandy can enhance your

Ever-increasing costs have become a fact of life in club operations, and managers have had to perform some feats of magic to keep their clubs and resorts in the black. Increased dues and special assessments are temporary ways out of the spiraling cost dilemma, but new business growth is what's needed to put a club operation on the road to long term profitability.

A well-managed wine and brandy merchandising program offers a proven method for bringing new and impressive profits into your operation. An effective program here can return as much as 50 percent on sales. Compared to other products regularly marketed through golf facilities, a good inventory of wine and brandy requires a modest investment both in dollars and space. Secondly, offering a wide selection of premium wines and brandies brings the extra dividend of added prestige.

In 1976, Americans consumed 378 million gallons of wine, an increase of almost 24 percent in the past 5 years. Most important, though, is the fact that restaurant wine sales make up the largest and fastest segment of growth within this wine boom. Are you getting your share of this high-profit business? The approaches and sales techniques I'm going to describe here should get you well on the way.

Service personnel training programs, such as those run by Mel Flyer (facing page), prepare club employees for selling and serving wine and brandy. One important facet (below) calls for learning to evaluate the color and brilliance of the wine.

"An effective wine and brandy merchandising program can return as much as 50 percent profit on sales."

Each of these types of program has advantages and disadvantages, and let's take a quick look at both sides of the coin in each category. First off, selling wines through a wine list makes great sense economically: you can achieve a better markup here than with almost any other type of program. Also, a handsome, well-constructed wine list brings an added degree of sophistication to your dining room.

There are a few disadvantages in basing your wine sales efforts strictly around a wine list. This approach calls for a high degree of salesmanship on the part of waiters/waitresses — selling from a wine list presupposes a wine-knowledgeable staff and clientele. A wine list by itself on the table (with no additional merchandising aids) is an ineffective way of selling. Finally, wine lists require extensive inventories.

Selling wine by half and full carafes has its good and not-so-good points, too. Carafe sales tend to cut into bottle purchases, but wine by the carafe is a very profitable route to consider: 50 percent is a standard minimum markup. This method requires a minimal inventory, and best of all, it provides your service personnel with an easy way to sell wine. When serving carafe wines, there are no corks to pull, service is fast, and your people need to know just three types of wine: red, white, and pink. Obviously, waiters and waitresses have fewer inhibitions about wine service when using the carafe approach.

Wine-by-the-glass is most profitable when tied in with a carafe program. The percentage of markup here is greater than on wine sold by the bottle. Experience has shown that the average restaurant patron is more receptive to purchasing a glass of wine than a bottle of wine. Promoting wine by the glass also eliminates confusion in pairing the appropriate wine with various entrées. It can also produce additional revenues from convention and/or party groups. A program chairman or party host might balk at the notion of placing a few bottles of wine on the tables, but he will generally agree to serving a glass of wine to everyone for an additional 50¢ per person. Wine by the glass keeps the consumption of alcoholic beverages within the bounds of moderation and adds a note of elegance to the event.

The keys to success
It's fairly obvious that since each of these three methods has some unique benefits, a balanced approach — a combina-
A brief history of wine

by David C. Ludwig

David C. Ludwig has authored many articles and columns on wine for local and national publications and has conducted many wine tastings and lectures along the East Coast. He is presently New Jersey Wine Master, Wine Club of America.

"A day without wine is a day without sunshine," Henry IV, king of France and Navarre, is said to have observed more than 400 years ago. Yet this great warrior was referring to an elixir that was already 6,000 years old, for the story of wine predates Western civilization.

The exact time, place, and person who discovered wine is lost in the dark mists of the past. We do know, however, that the earliest records of the Egyptians clearly show that wine was widely used by 4000 B.C. It was possibly the Phoenicians, that intrepid race of seafarers, who were responsible for spreading the fame of wine, along with a great many other accoutrements of civilization, to the semibarbaric peoples of the Mediterranean shores.

As these peoples gradually developed their own cultures, they assimilated the basics of winemaking, varying these basics with grapes and methods best suited to their particular area. The Greeks, for instance, originated the practice of filiming the top of their wine with a layer of pine resins to preserve it. This practice led to the present-day Greek national beverage, retsina.

With the rise of the Roman Empire, winemaking for the first time left the shores of the Mediterranean and spread northward to what was later to become France and Germany. The vineyards of France, in fact, produced wine of such high quality that the Roman emperors banned the growing of grapes in France to prevent competition with the wines of Italy.

In the fifth century, as the Teutonic hordes swept across the borders of the empire and the pall of the dark ages fell over Europe, the tending of the vineyards fell into the stewardship of the various orders of Catholic monks. Their simplistic lifestyle was responsible for establishing the tradition of excellence in the early vineyards of Europe.

In the eighth century, when Charlemagne temporarily restored some semblance of order to the West, one of his first loves and chief concerns was establishing the vineyards in Burgundy that to this day bear his name (Corton-Charlemagne).

Throughout the remainder of the Middle Ages, after the heirs of Charlemagne divided his empire into small warring feudal states, the assorted overseers of the vines, both cleric and layman, experimented, tested, and slowly developed the various grape types and viniculture methods used to produce the fine wines that we know today.

But an essential ingredient for the final perfection of wine had to await the second half of the 17th century, when, according to tradition, a Benedictine monk named Dom Perignon, the father of Champagne, devised a cork to replace the ineffective pegs and rags that were used to stopper bottles, thus producing a method of sealing bottles from the air.

In the 18th and 19th centuries, quality viniculture... centered in France, but quality control, as we now know it, was sometimes lacking. With the approach of the International Exposition in Paris in 1855, it was decided that something should be done about this. So in Bordeaux a system was devised to rate the various vineyards on the basis of consistent dedication to excellence.

Under this system the finest vineyards of the region were grouped in five categories or growths. As important as these classifications were and are, it was not until the 1930's that the full weight of law was placed behind quality control with the passage in France of what are known as the laws of appellation d'origine, under which qualifying wines may be labeled appellation controlee.

In this century Italy and Germany have joined France in establishing strict, nationwide controls over the production of wine.

In this country much progress has been made, in the last several years, toward establishing national regulations regarding wine production and labeling.

On the subject of U.S. wines, considering that prohibition was repealed only 40 years ago, their quality and variety is amazing.

Remember that the only way to learn about wine is to taste some and there is no substitute for pulling a cork. Only as you expose yourself to different wines will you begin to understand what makes one wine better than another, and you will recognize the complexity that characterizes the finest wines.
encourage this through a well-organized incentive program. Goals can be based on dollars and/or unit sales, and where legal, cash rewards may be offered for outstanding performance. A system which measures results is a basic element in any incentive program. Friendly competition among your employees, when combined with a method of measuring success (such as a weekly or monthly sales progress chart), will get your wine sales program off to a flying start. Permitting employees to participate in the profit goals of the club or resort also does wonders for overall morale.

Merchandising the way to profits
There are lots of things a club manager can do to raise the "wine consciousness" of his clientele. For example, when reprinting your menu, list a specific wine suggestion directly beneath each entrée (include bin number, a description of the wine and price — or, if you wish, carafes can be listed instead of bottled wine). Setting every table with 0½-ounce, all-purpose wine glasses puts the suggestion of wine at your patron's fingertips.

Here are more promotional techniques to stimulate interest: informative wine lists (complete with phonetic pronunciation of wine names/types, go-together suggestions, maps of viticultural regions throughout the world), wine-in-rack displays around the dining room, and single fifth bottles of wine on every table will serve as effective sales stimulators. Menu clip-ons highlighting various wine specials ("Wine of the Month") and placemats imprinted with wine selections are also effective reminders.

Incidentally, a growing number of club and resort operators are using the "Wine of the Month" promotion to market test a new wine before adding it to the wine list.

Turning after-dinner coffee into gold
Often neglected in looking for new areas of profitability in club/resort operations is the after-dinner experience. A round of after-dinner drinks (especially coffee/brandy combinations) can return as much or more profit as all of the dinner checks at a table. A calorie-conscious public has put the crimp into the profit-rich add-ons of fancy desserts. Creating something special with coffee is a way to give the customer what he wants and yet create additional profit. Right now, with coffee prices continually going up, it costs you from 10 to 15c and more to serve a cup of coffee. Here are three ways to make something special out of coffee:

Venetian Coffee
Add 1 ounce of brandy to a 6-ounce cup of hot black coffee. Add ¼ teaspoon sugar. Top with a mound of whipped cream. Serve.

Brandy Café
Pour 1 ounce of brandy in a 6-ounce cup of hot black coffee. Add twist of lemon peel. Serve.

Cappuccino
Add 1 ounce of brandy to 6-ounce mug of Caffe D’Vita mixed with boiling water. Top with whipped cream. Serve.

In addition to these coffee drinks, brandy, that versatile spirit, goes beautifully in these two winners:

Mexicali
Pour 1½ ounce of brandy to ½ ounce Kahlua (or other coffee liqueur) in a 25-ounce snifter. Fill snifter half full of ice cubes and pour brandy and Kahlua over cubes. Serve well chilled.

The Asp
Combine 1 ounce of brandy and 1 ounce Amaretto in a 25-ounce snifter half filled with ice cubes. Serve.

L'Orange La Salle is a refreshing change of pace for after dinner:

L'Orange La Salle
Place scoop orange sherbert into glass, pour in 4-5 ounces The Christian Brothers Chateau La Salle and add splash of soda.

For health food enthusiasts, how about offering an individual cheese and fruit board with a half carafe of sherry or port as a way to make the after-dinner experience truly memorable?

There are many ways to merchandise the after-dinner experience to club/resort patrons. You can list these "dessert drinks" under desserts on the menu; use special coffee boards imprinted with an offering of your unusual coffee drinks; include the price of a novel glass or mug in the price of the drink and encourage your guests to take the item home as a souvenir; use table tents and menu clip-ons as reminders or create drama by flaming a few of these brandy specialties.

Turning coffee into a high-profit item is easy. These ideas will help create larger tips for waiters/waitresses, increase your check averages, prevent customers from tying up tables by asking for coffee refills, and will add excitement and elegance to any club or resort.
