THE FERGUSON NIGHT CRAWLER

Fast -- Efficient Economical

"You got it!" and "That's it!", comments from the Greenkeepers who have seen it in operation.

The Night Crawler takes the expense out of hollow tining greens and its straight-in straight-out action makes clean cut plugs leaving the putting surface undisturbed for immediate play.

The smooth, positive movement of the Night Crawler extracts $\frac{3}{2}$ inch plugs and at the same time moves forward at a steady walking pace removing 36,000 plugs per hour. See the Night Crawler demonstrated before ordering aerification equipment.

Merchandising for Pro Shops To Meet Store Competition

By LOUIS BERTOLONE

Clubs that hire a pro expect him to look after the needs of members. A club does not want its members buying their golf supplies elsewhere, or taking lessons from another club pro in the vicinity. When this happens, the club stands to lose members. And no club wants to lose members.

How much business are pros missing? And why are they missing this business? Golf is played only at one place, the golf course. Hence every golfer, sooner or later, must come into contact, either in a superficial manner or as a deeply interested patron, with the golf shop. The deeply interested patron is not our primary concern in this article because he already buys his merchandise from the pro at the course. We are here interested in the superficial patron, the man or woman, who buys golf supplies from a downtown store, be it a sporting goods shop, a drug store, hardware store, or what have you. And believe me, this part of the market should be the concern of every golf pro; not only because of loss in revenue but because the golf course golf shop should get most of this business as the logical place for consumers of golf supplies to make their purchases.

The salesmen at the golf courses have the advantage over the downtown store in securing this golf business; yet the amount of golf supplies that are bought through other channels is too large. One store in a Pacific Coast city does an annual gross business of over $100,000 in the sales of golf clubs, bags, etc. An estimate of the amount of golf supplies that are bought in downtown stores in that city is several times $100,000. Putting a gross profit on this merchandise, again conservatively, at 30%, one can easily figure the loss in revenue suffered by the dozen pros in this vicinity, about $90,000, or approximately $7,500 per golf course pro.

A lot of business in any man's league, to lose, especially when at least, half of this business could be brought through the course shop without too much difficulty.

Accent on Display

In order to get this business the golf course pros must have well-stocked golf shops. But even more important, the golf supplies and merchandise must be prominently displayed in an artistic and appealing manner. It must catch the eye of every person coming into the shop. If the pro, or his assistants have no talents in arranging displays, I suggest that the pro get in touch with a department store window trimmer. Employ his services for only one day of each month. He will see to it that your merchandise is displayed in a manner that will attract customers. That is his business. He is a professional at his trade and the few dollars that will be required to obtain his services will be offset by satisfaction in knowing that your displays are as professionally arranged as those of your competitor whose business you are trying to entice through your shop, and by increased sales.

I have seen innumerable well-stocked golf shops. In fact only recently I was told of a golf shop which claimed the distinction of being the finest golf shop on the west coast. This is quite a claim to make; so I went over to inspect it. I was indeed taken by surprise.

The shop must have had at least $30,000 to $35,000 worth of new golf merchandise in it. The shop itself is huge, hav-
When women get into the habit of "shopping" at the pro shop they give the shop considerable advertising, as well as business. They talk about values and bargains. They usually are instinctively good judges of merchandise. When men around a club hear women talking favorably of pro shop goods the men members get the idea the pro is a good, sound merchant. Price tags draw women, but women aren't shy about asking the price if merchandise isn't plainly priced. Men often are backward about asking; afraid they'll be rated as "cheap" if they don't buy.

The merchandise was so poorly displayed that it created a bad impression. The clubs were lined up in racks against the walls in the customary way. Bags were thrown about the shop in a random fashion. Shoes and sweaters peered out of boxes that bore marks of careless handling. Tissue paper protruded from under the squashed-on covers, giving an appearance to the merchandise of having been cursorily inspected, and more swiftly replaced into the box, and then thrown away in disgust. This carelessness prevailed throughout the shop. Torn and dirty old magazines littered the tables, the floor was unswept. The bargain barrel sat right in the middle of the floor, where every customer nearly tripped over it. The shop didn't have the immaculate atmosphere of a down town shop.

After having your shop fully stocked and the merchandise prominently and artistically displayed be sure that you and your assistants radiate confidence, enthusiasm, and cheerfulness. When anyone, and I mean anyone, asks you, "How are things going?" reply in the affirmative with a positive tone to your voice, accentuate your biggest sales item, and follow up with optimism for the future.

I prefer the line that I learned from a caddy a long time ago. When I asked him how business was with him, he replied, "I earned $7.20 today, my best day so far, but I expect to earn more tomorrow."

This makes the customers feel that you are doing a good job, that you are giving...
