Hot Dog! Golf Course Owner’s Idea Helps Increase Rounds

BY LARRY AYLWARD, EDITOR

Fred Smith rolled out the frankfurters and the golfers rolled in.

In the fall of 2000, Smith, owner of Riverwood Golf and Athletic Club in Clayton, N.C., a suburb of Raleigh, was looking for ways to increase rounds at his 27-hole golf course. Smith was disenchanted that his course, built in 1996, was only yielding 25,000 rounds a year. “I wanted people to play our course at a value and price that we could drive more traffic,” Smith says.

Smith, whose company builds entire communities, not just golf courses, contemplated his approach. He wanted to keep his strategy in line with his business slogan, “Delivering More for Less.” “We strive to deliver value to our customers, and that’s defined as getting more than you expect for what you’re paying for,” Smith says. “We’re along the Wal-Mart philosophy.”

Smith brainstormed for ideas how the course could deliver a golfing experience that was more for less. One thing was for sure: Smith knew the answer didn’t lie with the course’s food-and-beverage segment.

Golfers didn’t come to Riverwood for the fine dining because the course offers no fine dining. And golfers didn’t stop in the clubhouse for a beer after their rounds because Riverwood doesn’t sell libations.

The course did, however, offer a modest snack bar. And that’s where Smith turned his attention.

The snack bar employed one full-time person and offered the basic junk foods. It wasn’t losing money, but it wasn’t making a lot of money, either. After Smith studied the total cost of the operation, a notion came to him that involved mustard and ketchup.

The snack bar would be scaled back to a hot dog rotisserie and soda machine, and transformed into a self-service center that would also include vending machines, Smith thought. Hungry golfers could stop in the clubhouse after playing nine, grab a hot dog and soda and make the turn in no time.

Smith put the idea into action last year.

“It’s been well-received,” Smith says, noting that rounds increased from 25,000 to 37,000 last year. “We’re now known as that place where you play golf and get free hot dogs.”

Smith admits that nice weather last year also sparked the growth in rounds. But he’s as sure as brown mustard is spicy that the free hot dogs had a lot to do with the increase.

Overall, the course made more money, thanks to the increased rounds ($42 with cart on the weekend), and didn’t miss the modest sales from its snack bar. The cost of providing free hot dogs and soft drinks was minimal compared to the revenue gained from nearly a 50-percent gain in rounds. Smith hopes the hot dog idea flies like a great tee shot this year.

“It’s been a better economic decision,” he notes, adding that a common sight is a golfer walking out of the clubhouse with two hot dogs in one hand and a soda in the other. “[The theme] is consistent with our entire brand.”

Smith says the course doesn’t promote the hot dog and soda giveaway, except for a sign in the pro shop that reads, “We want to deliver more for less, and we want you to enjoy your golf round. So have a hot dog and drink on us.” Most advertising has been word of mouth.

The moral of this story? Don’t underestimate the mighty, mouth-watering all-beef wiener.

“It’s America,” Smith says.

The business of growing grass has always embraced my workaholic tendencies. That reminds me, I recently celebrated the 10th anniversary of setting out on my dream (geez, I sound like an old geezer.) In May of 1992, I decided to take my soil-oriented, eco-agricultural-spiced and sustainable turfgrass-management strategies out on the road to see if I could make a difference in growing grass and actually help superintendents and the game.

I didn’t have much support from my peers. My entire superintendent buddy system told me I’d be back at the helm of a course when the first grand opportunity came along. All of my commercial “friends” had opinions, too, that weren’t supportive. But I embraced the challenge that my dream presented. Proving people wrong was a great motivator.

I did prove them wrong, thanks to my solid work ethic and love for the industry. But I’m starting to wonder if my dedication to the industry is healthy.

People talk about “giving back to the business” as if that’s taking the same noble paths as Mother Theresa and the Dali Lama in their quests to help the world. I’m guilty of a similar mantra and have been known to spew forth my version of “doing so much for the business that has done so much for me.”

But times are changing. Jaded in my old age, I’m not. Realistic about what I see and hear, I certainly am. I’m in love with our crazy business, but it isn’t obliged to love me back — and it certainly isn’t giving more than I put into it.

Looking back, not much else mattered when I was growing grass as a superintendent. Well, beer did, but that was something to drink with other turfheads when you needed to talk about growing grass.

Then, marriage No. 1 came and went in a flash of nights spent at the pump station and mornings out of the house at 4 a.m. after going to bed at 9 p.m. The weekends spent working didn’t help sustain that marriage. Neither did two job changes.

A few weeks ago, after yet another plane trip where I was stuffed into a seat too small for my ever-expanding and road-food nourished ass, I collapsed into a heap after not remembering how I got home. I’d experienced a hypertension attack along with angina. The doctor said it was a near heart attack. I thought I was going to die as I stupidly drove myself to the hospital.

What did I see as my life passed before my eyes? A person who has given his life, his love, his health, his money and his never-ending determination to The Business.

I think to myself that I’ve given a lot to the greater good of turfgrass — maybe too much. After all, isn’t giving your livelihood the ultimate sacrifice?

Ten years of consulting has yielded me a bit of credibility, yet I’m apt to measure myself by the failures I’ve had and to some degree by what others are saying about me from their safe, salaried, protected, non-grass growing positions. I’ve been an independent solo act and have not worked with a net. (Actually, that’s not entirely true. I have true friends in this business who are indeed my net as they understand the plight of the workaholic.)

But is my life worth giving to the business that has given me so much? Or is it really true that the business has taken and taken and taken at considerable expense? Maybe when I’m carrying the bag for the Dali Lama at Nirvana Golf and Zen Bunker Raking Club, I’ll get that answer and achieve my Total Consciousness.

For now, the wisdom I’m learning that I can share with you is that balance is a thing turfheads like me don’t do well and must learn to do better. That includes being real about what we can and should be giving and to whom we should be sacrificing for.

Two friends are playing golf. One of them lands on a dirt track covered in gravel, so he asks his friend, "Do you mind if I have a drop? I can’t play from here; it’s too rough."

"Sorry, but you play from where you lie."

"But I'm going to wreck my club—it's all rocks and gravel," he says.

"Hey, no favors. You play from where you lie."

The poor guy stops arguing and takes his first trial swing. Gravel and sparks fly everywhere, Second swing, same again. Finally he feels ready, moves to the ball and hits... gravel and sparks everywhere, but the ball flies off beautifully, lands on the green and stops inches from the cup.

His friend is astounded. "My God, what a shot! Which club did you use?"

"Your five iron..."

Out of Bounds

SOMETHING COMPLETELY DIFFERENT

top 10 CDs

There's an old parlor game you can play that's guaranteed to keep you occupied for hours. The premise is that you're stuck on a desert island indefinitely. The question you have to answer is, "What 10 CDs would you take to pass the time?"

Now, whenever folks play this argument-inducing game, there's always a wise guy who says, "And we are to assume there is power and a stereo on this island?"

The answer is, "Yes." We have generously supplied you with approximately 14,000 cases of batteries and a durable boom-box.

The ground rules are simple: no boxed sets, but double albums are OK. Compilations are fine, but not your own burned CDs. For the sake of argument, your music never wears out.

Paramount to this gambit is your ability to cover the musical bases. Lord knows what kinds of mood swings you'll go through, but you'll want to make sure you can turn it up, tone it down or find some middle ground as necessary.

So at the risk of angry e-mails telling me how ignorant, foolish or misguided I am, here, in alphabetical order by artist, is the Official Out of Bounds Top 10 Desert Island CDs list:

Miles Davis, Kind of Blue. Potent, timeless, simultaneously soothing and energetic.

Arthur Dodge and the Horsefeathers, Nervous Habit. A hard-to-find 2000 release on the Horsemonkey label, but Dodge's songwriting and the tight musicianship are worth the search.

Bob Dylan, Blood on the Tracks. This latter-day Whitman carves arguably the best of his records.

Ella Fitzgerald, Sings the Duke Ellington Songbook. Two masters for the cost of one.

Glenn Gould, Bach's Goldberg Variations. Gould was a bit of an eccentric, as you can hear him murmuring to himself underneath his exquisite piano work.

Elmore James, Dust My Broom. The king of blues slide guitar. Often overlooked and underappreciated.

Aimee Mann, Bachelor No. 2. Elegant lessons in song-craft and ennui.

Mos Def, Black on Both Sides. My all-time favorite hip-hop album.

The Rolling Stones, Exile on Main Street. The bad boys rip this joint at their most daring and naughty.

Lucinda Williams, Car Wheels on a Gravel Road. Luscious, heartbreaking, slightly countrified songs with bite.

And a baker's dozen back-up: The Beatles, Revolver; The Clash, London Calling; John Coltrane, Giant Steps; Ry Cooder, Paris, Texas; Elvis Costello, My Aim is True; Cowboy Junkies, Trinity Sessions; Billie Holiday, Lady Day; The Best of Billie Holiday; Nirvana, Nevermind; Frank Sinatra and Antonio Jobim, Francis Albert Sinatra & Antonio Carlos Jobim; The Sonics, Here are the Sonics; Uncle Tupelo, Anodyne; Tom Waits, Small Change; and The White Stripes, White Blood Cells.
