We’ve all heard the excuse, “The dog ate my homework.” A friend of mine actually tried using this old standby in a high-school English class. Unfortunately for him, he forgot what a small town we lived in and his parents were friends with the English teacher, who happened to know he did not in fact own a dog.

Recently, as I was submitting an advertisement to the local paper for some seasonal help, I started thinking of the old dog-ate-my-homework saying in a bit of a different light. I started thinking about all the excuses I’ve been given over the years by employees trying to explain or justify an absence. Somehow, the dog-eating-my-homework line seemed quite fitting.

But let me point out that I’m very lucky in that I have a terrific group of full-time employees on my staff — eight hard-working and dedicated individuals. With this core group, along with the assistant superintendent, the mechanic and myself, we have to add only five or six seasonal people every spring. Sounds easy, right?

Easy, however, it has never been. Filling out the crew every spring is one of the hardest things I do in the course of a year. Well, actually, the initial filling out of the crew is not usually that hard. An ad in the local paper in March usually elicits a good response and I’m able to hire five or six people from the field. However, those five or six — as good as they seem each year when I hire them — rarely work out.

On average, I’d say one or two may make it through the summer — and that’s a generous forecast. Ultimately, I end up running another ad in June once the last of this initial group fizzes out. The second ad doesn’t garner as much response, and usually I’m forced to hire the two or three stragglers who come in.

This second group, again, has a low batting average — below the Mendoza line for all you baseball fans. Sometimes, a third ad is needed in August, just to get through to October and... past aerification. If this third ad brings in more than one or two, it is deemed a success. In fact, I'm downright giddy if the person I hire from this third ad makes it six weeks.

Why the employees don't tend to last is the stuff of another article altogether. But what I wanted to address here in this article was the incredible array of excuses I get each year from these people who try to explain missing work.

Now, I'm not saying all of these excuses have not been legitimate (excuse me why I clear my throat), but one tends to develop a certain intuition, if you will, regarding when someone is being truthful and when your chain is getting yanked. The pattern is almost always the same. The employee places a sick call about three or four days into the job. Then he makes another sick call a few days later. A third sick call, about a week later, gets a little more creative. And then there's the infamous fourth call, when an employee knows he has to come up with something good. The fourth call is usually an incredibly detailed tale of misfortune and bad luck. It is ultimately this fourth call that tends to lead certain superintendents to contemplate the state of today's youth and where this country is headed.

So, without further adieu, let me list some of all-time favorite calls (almost all of these were messages left on the answering machine the night before a morning of work). Most of these are actual calls. And a few, although they were never made, are calls you feel like could have been made anyway.

I've categorized the calls into the following four subject heads: sickness, transportation, family member illness or death, and miscellaneous (for those calls that just defy categorization).

Sickness

- "Went out for sushi last night. I think I got food poisoning. A lot of the food wasn't even cooked! Don't think I can make it in."
- "Sorry I'm calling late. My alarm didn't go off. But then when I did finally wake up, I realized I was sick. I won't make it in today."

More Excuses

According to CareerBuilder, about one-third of U.S. employees called in sick last year even though they weren't sick. Some of the excuses they left were doozies. Here are three of our favorites:

- An employee said his dog wasn't feeling well, so the employee tasted the dog's food, got sick and called off.

- One employee said he was calling off because he was upset his favorite "American Idol" contestant was voted off the show.

- An employee said he didn't feel well and wanted to stay home to rest up for the company's holiday party that night.

- "My colon hurts. I think I need a colonoscopy. Gonna try and get one this morning."
- "A bee stung me, and I ate some shellfish. I don't know which one caused it but I'm pretty swollen today." (Might as well cover all bases.)
- "My teeth hurt for some reason. Better stay home today."
- "I'm having some kind of weird reaction to the mushrooms I ate last night. Maybe I should stay home?"

Transportation

- "My car broke down on the way to work."
- "My car broke down on the way to work, and I didn't have cell phone reception."
- "My car broke down on the way to work, my cell phone had no reception, and I had to walk 12 miles to the gas station."
- "My car broke down on the way to work, my cell phone had no reception, I had to walk 12 miles to the gas station and their phone was out of service."
- "My car broke down on the way to work, my cell phone had no reception, I had to walk 12 miles to the gas station — and I've got some swamp land in Florida if you're still listening to this message."

Family illness and deaths

- "My grandma died." (Now, I wouldn't list this if I didn't find out later that the reports of grandma's death had been greatly exaggerated.)
- "My dad died." (Again, not something I would normally list here, except for the fact that, amazingly, dad had died for the second time that summer.)
- "My dog has rabies."
- "Our family cat died. She was very special."

Miscellaneous

- "I have a court appearance in the morning at 8. My lawyer never told me about it. I think it's going to last all day."
- "Just found out I've got jury duty tomorrow. Can't get out of it."
- "I went to see the special midnight preview screening of the "Matrix Revolutions," and I'm really tired. I won't make it in."
- "I was up all night reading the new "Star Wars" novelization that just came out today. I'm really tired and won't make it in." (If you couldn't guess, same guy as above.)
- "My neighbor beat me up, and I'm pretty sore."
- "I beat up my neighbor, and I'm pretty sore."
- "I won't be coming to work in the morning. It's my birthday!"

Now, a drum roll please. ... Here's my all-time favorite excuse left on the answering machine:

- "Ron, this is Jack. I've been up really late with my girlfriend, and I'm so tired. I'm going to go to bed right now, and I'm going to sleep in. Please don't call and wake me. See you on Friday. Thanks."

Here's to honesty, if nothing else. •

Prevent the dreaded Pyrícularia grísea (for which there is no cure) by planting new, Gray Leaf Spot resistant ryegrasses developed by doctors for Turf Merchants.

Even the best home lawns, parks and golf courses have Gray Leaf Spot in late summer when days are hot and humid. Gray Leaf Spot isn't pretty. It strikes quickly, affecting young ryegrass seedlings first with gray-to-brown lesions, often contorting tender blades into fishhook shapes. With prolonged hot, humid weather, large, mature turf areas can be lost to this dreaded disease.

In existing, older ryegrass turfs, Gray Leaf Spot can be addressed by applying a preventive fungicide, but once the pathogen has developed, little or nothing can cure it. It's prudent to take precautions.

All this and more — naturally from:

Great turf is built on tradition.

We know how important beautiful turf conditions are to the game. For the past 53 years, we've owned and operated our own golf course. It's that hands-on experience that has taught us just how much energy, knowledge and passion superintendents put in to turf to keep it looking better... and playing better. Maybe that's why all of us here at Cleary are uncommonly committed to working with you to keep your turf looking and playing at its best.

Cleary – your partner in product research and formulation.
