With Baseball On Strike, What Will Happen to Spring Training?

With the baseball strike still on in mid-January, and spring training camps due to open in mid-February, will that heady call, “Play Ball,” still ring out?

Yes, according to sports turf professionals. Supplies are still being bought; fields are still being maintained; all preparations are moving forward for “business as usual.” The question is - not will they play, but who will play? And - how will the events that unfold affect baseball and all the people and things related to it?

The baseball strike has had an affect on everyone - players, team owners, stadium facility owners, fans - and the sports turf professionals. Sports turf pros are the ones who have spent all these months preparing their fields for the things to come.

Because many major league teams lease their spring camp facilities, cities in warm weather sites vied for the opportunity to serve as camp headquarters for major league teams - and their minor league affiliates. Game and practice fields, stadiums and all the peripheral facilities have been developed or expanded to fulfill the needs of the teams.

Why? Teams draw crowds and crowds spend money that boosts the community economy. Early season Fantasy Camps bring hundreds of middle-aged dreamers on site to play real games with their heroes. As the full contingent of players move into camp to get in shape, hone their skills, and vie for positions on the team, dedicated fans gather to watch their progress. Sportscasters from across North America - and the world - converge to observe, interview, photograph and tape the action. When minor league players come into the camp, the outreach to fans and sportscasters extends to all those cities where these teams play throughout the year. The result - more fans and sportscasters converge on the camp sites.

This economic impact extends to those connected with the teams and the facility itself - the sports turf manager and crews, those who prepare the stadium, sell tickets, sell goodies, launder the towels and uniforms, keep the rooms clean, prepare the meals - and beyond into the community. Think of the use of hotel rooms, restaurants, and airport facilities, the rental cars, the extra activity at area shopping and sightseeing facilities.

Budgets must be planned well in advance. How do you compensate when a big chunk of your money comes from spring training camps or related spending? Sports turf managers have scheduled crews and maintenance procedures throughout the “off season” in preparation for camp opening. Everything and everyone must be in place to keep the fields safe, playable and aesthetically pleasing.

Facility managers and municipalities are counting on the revenue generated from season ticket sales, promotions, special nights, and all those things that go

“Promoting Better & Safer Sports Turf Areas”
President’s Message
by Greg Petry
President

As I complete my first year, which is the mid-point of my term as President of STMA, I am happy to say that we were able to accomplish most of what we set out to do this year.

Finances were one of our main concerns at the start of the year. Thanks to a number of people working together, we have been able to get them in order, with a few surprises, and a few disappointments. The surprises include extra revenue from sportsTURF magazine. This has been a big help to us all.

The biggest disappointment was that the regional institutes were not as well attended as anticipated, and therefore did not generate much revenue. These institutes are a major educational event and all of us should make an attempt to attend at least one a year. We now have an educational committee looking into more ways to promote what we already have, as well as forming more opportunities for us all.

Our main goal was just to keep going, and growing, and we have certainly done that.

Thank you to Bret, Carey and Tina at STMA headquarters, and a number of other people who will be recognized at the conference in Bradenton.

I’d like to see us continue to grow in 1995, to keep our finances under control, and even build a surplus. In order to do that, it’s going to take ALL of us, working together. Let’s all try to recruit at least one new member in 1995. Can you imagine where we’ll be at this time next year? I CAN! STM along with spring training camps. Nor can other events take up the slack. Most spring camp facilities are designed for - and dedicated to - the game of baseball.

So many questions remain to be answered.

In the short term - will municipalities continue to support the sports turf professionals at the previously-budgeted levels? Will the added stress on personnel who will be working under less that ideal circumstances take a toll?

In the long term - how will the extended strike and whatever the solution may be affect the game of baseball? Will fans continue to support major league teams? Will the minor league system emerge stronger - or weaker? Will college and high school baseball programs continue to thrive? STM
