London's exclusive Queens Club stays atop the international lawn tennis world with aggressive solutions to today's sports problems.

Neither are welcome at the Queens Club, an exclusive London tennis enclave. The reason? They're irritating—McEnroe to club members, the shoe to the grass playing surface.

Dawns the new hard-charging world of sport at this oasis of gentility—turfed tennis playground for London society. Aggressive play and modern equipment push the groundsman and the grass here to their limits.

Groundskeeper Dave Kimpton shoves back.

"We banned them," says Kimpton of the new pimple-soled footwear. Initially worn by visiting pros for better traction and quicker starts, the new shoe caught on till finally 90 percent of the players on the club's famed grass courts were wearing them. The grass—a mixture of perennial rye, creeping red and chewings fescue, bluegrass, and browntop—couldn't take it.

"These people are super fit and they can run around for three or four hours," says Kimpton. "It's really a different game now. These people are more aggressive. The courts take a beating."

"Blame also today's athlete. "These people are super fit and they can run around for three or four hours," says Kimpton. "It's really a different game now. These people are more aggressive. The courts take a bashing."

Centennial year

Kimpton, intense as he is short, ranks as one of England's most respected (and better paid) groundsmen. This marks the 100th year for his club which began as an ice rink and rifle range and, about 50 years ago, installed tennis courts. Old, well-maintained apartments circle the club with blocks of startlingly different architecture marking the fall of German bombs 43 years ago. Dave starts his 20th year here.

Tennis is this club's calling card. In addition to the turf courts, players have their choice of clay and synthetic surfaces. New indoor tennis and squash courts recently came into play also.

Things are happening at this square patch of green in the bustling, over-grown West Kensington area. The club is internationally known.

Financially hurting through the 1950s, the Queen's Club revived under the management of the Lawn Tennis Association, England's governing body of tennis. Along with this infusion of cash and renewed spirit rises new offices of the International Tennis Federation bringing 100 new faces.

While better-known Wimbledon numbers 375 members, the Queen's Club counts 4,000 with about half that number playing regularly. "This is a club that is used and used all the time," says Kimpton. Court time is booked eight days in advance.

But, like Wimbledon, the Queen's Club hosts a major tournament annually when spectator stands cover two of Kimpton's turf courts. Galleries of 15,000 crowd to watch top interna...

Court tips
Here’s how Kimpton prepares these turf courts:

- Each spring he scarifies, passing sharp blades over the courts five or six times. Spikes are criss-crossed an additional six or eight times, the final pass with one-inch spikes for overseeding.
- An application of chlordane kills the earthworms. Worm castings play havoc with a bouncing tennis ball.
- Fungicides are usually needed several times each summer. “I just tend to keep an eye on things,” says Kimpton. “If I see something down there, I have to tweak it.”
- Fertilizer in a light peat base is applied twice annually, in the spring and the fall. The fall feeding is heavier with phosphorus and potassium, the spring application with nitrogen.
- Sand topdressing at least twice each season helps smooth out the wrinkles.
- Soil pH is checked at least once every two seasons.

Kimpton’s job is to maintain the health of the turf while providing the hardest, smoothest surface possible. Ransomes reel mowers keep the turf at \( \frac{3}{16} \)-inch.

Says Kimpton, “it’s getting to the stage where I’m beginning to need a head groundsman to do some of my work.” And part of that reason, of course, is the attention his courts get from world caliber players.

Says Kimpton: “The professionals play here four or five weeks each year, and the wear they create is more severe in that short period of time than the members the rest of the season.”

And the banned McEnroe, a three-time champion at the Queen’s Club?

“I guess it’s bit snobbish,” Kimpton says with a hint of a smile in his blue eyes.

SOUTER OF STIRLING

Scotsman John Souter’s international reputation grows as the rescuer of sports playing surfaces. Providing proper drainage is his starting point.

John Souter, stonefaced in thought, sits in the gloom of Glasgow’s Ibrox Stadium, in the director’s box. The people to know fill these sheltered, mid-field seats high above play. These are the people who gather at halftime in a cozy paneled room to trade pleasantries over coffee and tasty bite-sized pastries.

Souter earned his station in this group.

This 40ish Scot—always, it seems, dressed for business—makes a comfortable living giving his sport-loving countrymen with what they want. And what they want is grass that can take the pounding of cleated athletes during Scotland’s damp North Sea winter. That’s the season for rugby and soccer here, played in huge concrete stadiums brimming with rabid fans. Deep-seated rivalries lure busesloads of excited spectators, dressed in club colors and chanting club songs, miles from home.

In contrast, the enigmatic Souter. Business is business in his world, no shenanigans. His employees don’t drink and drive. They, like Souter, dress well; they pick their words with care. And fun is fun. Souter’s lighthearted presentation honoring Dr. Bill Daniel slid into a round of song at the Midwest Turf Conference last March. His wit, sharp but not unkind, is often aimed inward.

Rain falls
Today soaked Ibrox pulsates as the hometown Rangers match up with the visiting soccer team from Dundee. A weeklong rain that barely slackens prior to gametime has Souter, in a natty camel overcoat, his straight blonde hair pasted over a balding pate, surveying the shredded grass in the goal mouths.

Earlier this week this same Ibrox field drank in three inches of rain while the Rangers battled a Spanish team in what one local sports writer described “as the worst conditions I’ve seen in 25 years of covering the game.” The scars of that contest, just three days later, are not evident.

That the game is played at all speaks well for the dogged inbred persistence of the turfgrass (mostly perennial ryegrass). And for Souter’s work. Ibrox is just one of many fields installed or
