Give a little, get a little

My neighbor, Sean, is one of the most giving people I know. I live in the Cleveland snow belt, and we had some serious accumulation early this year. One morning, just as I was putting on layers of warm clothes and boots and grabbing the snow shovel, he walked his snowblower over to clear my driveway. He saved our backs more than a few times this winter.

In the spring, he is usually the first one to mow his lawn … and the common areas on our street … and some of the neighbors’ yards. He cruises around on his mower, and before we’ve even had our first cup of coffee, he’s done. “I enjoy it,” he says, and leaves it at that.

Sean’s giving attitude inspires others on the street. After one particularly bad winter storm, he started clearing neighbors’ driveways before many made it home from work. Once they got home, at least four other neighbors joined in. Before long, the impromptu crew had every driveway on the street cleared.

My husband and I tend to feel guilty after these generous acts. We always want to reciprocate. But, most of the time, Sean refuses to let us.

So I tend to talk about him … a lot. He owns a window and door installation business, and I recommend him … a lot. His regular unselfish acts speak volumes about his character and, in my opinion, his work ethic.

One person doing something for someone else is great. But an entire industry providing needed services across the country is extraordinary.

On April 22 – Earth Day – more than 3,000 Green Industry professionals put a hold on regular business to donate their services to various community projects in 38 states across the U.S. and Canada during the Professional Landcare Network’s 2nd annual Day of Service. Landscape Management’s Ron Hall, Dan Jacobs and myself traveled to Ohio, Colorado and Connecticut, respectively, to join various landscape teams in their efforts.

For each of us, it was a special experience:

› Because of a lack of funds and ongoing vandalism at Tarlton, OH’s Cross Mound Park, the entrance gate remains closed to visitors. But Ron witnessed its potential reopening because of Mirrorscapes’ service.

› After hearing about Riverside Cemetery’s years of water challenges, Dan watched industry efforts pick up the spirits of cemetery overseers and give new, more sustainable life to the 134-year-old grounds.

› And I witnessed the New Milford, CT-based YardApes’ crew give all of their effort — without earning a penny — to benefit the community’s children.

These events gave back to us in more ways than one. Now it’s our turn. In this issue, we showcase these teams’ distinctive projects and highlight what it did for them, both personally and professionally.

Who says one good deed doesn’t lead to another?
