Fred’s Take: Rising fuel prices don’t have to raise your blood pressure

Do NOT assess fuel charges to your invoice. Your customer works with set budgets, and raising your price may force them to take bids. If you do opt to use fuel charges, do not add them to your invoice without speaking to your customer first. Remember, their business is also being impacted somehow by rising fuel costs.

Manufacturing jobs are coming back to America. Well maybe not in the droves that would put an end to unpleasant unemployment numbers, but at least one company, Caterpillar, is doing its part. The manufacturer of all types of construction equipment, including a new line of Tier IV-ready skid steers, mini excavators, compact track loaders and multi-terrain loaders, announced in mid-February it will start building small-track type tractors and mini hydraulic excavators at a new plant in Athens, GA. Some 1,400 people will be employed at the new plant when it’s fully operational.

The new facility will be part of Caterpillar’s Building Construction Products (BCP) Division, which is based in Cary, NC.

Earlier in the year Caterpillar launched its D-series of skid steers and compact track loaders. Caterpillar invited a gaggle of press members to its North Carolina facilities to get a look at the new models and enjoy a little “stick time.”

According to the company, the new Tier IV ready machines offer increased fuel efficiency and productivity. For more information on the new products, visit your local Caterpillar dealer or the company’s website: www.cat.com.

Whenever you hear the words “mutual self destruction,” you want to tread carefully. Tom Oyler, of the Wilson-Oyler Group, knew that many of the attendees of the Professional Landcare Network’s (PLANET) Green Industry Great Escapes program would have a difficult time accepting his message.

“I’m wearing white, because I have a dark message,” Oyler quipped as he took the stage to give his keynote presentation.

The content of Oyler’s words were a sharp contrast to the relaxed surroundings of the event, held at the Atlantis Resort on Paradise Island in the Bahamas. But attendees weren’t there for just the fun and games.

Contractors are far too focused on their competitors and not enough on innovating, Oyler said. And while there is nothing wrong with eliminating waste, eking out a percentage point here and there is a temporary fix. Competitors — if they haven’t already — will simply copy that approach and your advantage is gone. Doing something no one else can replicate is what will truly separate a company from its competitors.

And proving he’s not all talk, Oyler said he’s working with a company to bring a new way to manage staffing to blow away the competition.

That carbureted engine in your ZTR is okay. And that’s being generous. Generally speaking, it usually starts and doesn’t give you too much trouble. At least that’s what it wants you to believe. Fact is that little gold digger is secretly milking you for every penny in your piggy bank. And doing it with a smile. ’Cause every time you fill up, two things happen: your wallet

EMPHTIES FASTER THAN A CHEAP PIÑATA.

And your kids’ college dreams try to find a happy place. Good news though: Common sense just called and said you can have your purse back. There’s another option. It’s called the

KOHLER COMMAND PRO® EFI ENGINE. Not only does it start on command, it can SAVE SERIOUS CASH ON FUEL compared to that vampire you got now. And did we mention there’s

NO CARBURETOR? So you can nix all those carburetor maintenance nightmares as well. The cat’s officially out of the bag, muchacho. “Okay” isn’t going to cut it any more. Your kids want to learn stuff.
What we don’t need to learn from Steve Jobs

Walter Isaacson’s recent biography of Steve Jobs, the demanding former head of Apple, apparently doubles as a management guide for many executives. Some have even donned the deceased executive’s trademark black turtleneck sweater.

I’m all for learning from others. I’ve had a number of bosses over the years, some good and some very, very bad. I nearly quit a job after receiving an email from one mid-level manager who reprimanded me for doing something that “wasn’t my job.” The problem was, it was my responsibility. It was a task given to me by his boss. Yet I nearly responded to the vicious, curt and overall demeaning tone of his email with a “four-letter” filled resignation letter. Fortunately, I allowed myself to calm down before hitting the send button. I used the delete button instead, but within a few months I chose to move on.

Jobs was known for his brusque, often intimidating style. He also possessed extraordinary talent and drive. My former mid-level manager seemed to share Jobs’ natural “gift” for bullying. The problem was he didn’t have Jobs’ track record of success, nor had he earned the respect of those he regularly berated, something that Steve Jobs clearly had.

There’s a danger in selectively picking and choosing certain traits to emulate. Jobs was effective not because he could bully people or because he focused so intently on design or any other single trait for which he is so admired. It was the package, the complex and nuanced way all those traits melded together that allowed Jobs to succeed.

As Isaacson said (in an article in the Wall Street Journal discussing executives using his book as a management bible): “I hate when people say, ‘I’m like Steve Jobs, I drive people to perfection.’ I say, well, make sure you have his talents as well.”

In other words, wearing black turtleneck sweaters and bringing employees to tears with a harsh and degrading demeanor isn’t going to help you build your company.

I’m not suggesting there isn’t something to learn from Jobs. Quite the contrary. He did some extraordinary things (that might be the understatement of the year) and had a vision and drive that surpassed the majority of executives. He was able to do what he did because of the unique makeup of his personality. Hijacking “pieces” of someone else’s approach and simply dropping them like bombs on your employees will most likely have harmful effects.

My goal has been to adopt and apply the traits I most admire and eschew the others. Trying to shoehorn Jobs’ management style into your business will likely be about as effective as installing a Windows operating system onto your Macintosh computer. You might be able to make things run, but the two weren’t created for each other. And why would you want change your approach in the first place? You created and built your business with your unique talents. You developed a team that has become accustomed to your management style and works well within it. There is always room to learn, adapt and grow. Chucking that aside and adopting the Jobs approach seems foolish — something Steve Jobs certainly wouldn’t have done.

My goal has been to adopt and apply the traits I most admire and eschew the others.
