A shopper can do very well purchasing an IBM compatible machine that basically does the same job as brand name units, but costs less. A typical 286 (type of processor) with a 40 megabyte hard drive (permanent memory) and VGA graphics (enhanced color) machine will provide excellent performance for the average superintendent. If you ever intend to use your computer as an irrigation central, ask your irrigation supplier what special equipment, like extended memory, may be necessary to run his software.

Third, be conservative. As a novice, don’t buy complex and very expensive software. Often, these software packages exceed both your pocketbook and your needs. Start with simple, cheap multipurpose software that is easy to learn and does almost everything you need to do. PFS First is a very popular program that many superintendents use. It offers a word processor, a spreadsheet program and a small database at a reasonable cost. Once you exceed the limits of the simple software packages, then you know it’s time to invest in a more complex and expensive package.

Lastly, stick with it. Many first-time computer users expect too much too soon. Stick to simple assignments that provide immediate results for your efforts. Writing letters, posting maintenance schedules, and making signs are all examples of little routines that make your job easier with the computer.

To determine if a computer is truly right for you, you really must consider the perception you wish to convey to those who evaluate you. Do you write letters and memos frequently? Do you ever plan to modernize your irrigation control? Will your organization benefit from tracking records, or preparing a better budget?

Perhaps the real question to ask when considering a computer is: Will I be a better golf course superintendent without one?
