"Old No. 7" Now Lost To Faculty Row

A little settlement of six campus dwellings that was reduced to three many years ago when the need for class space grew more rapidly than the ability of the college to construct new buildings, has now lost another member of its group as old "No. 7, Faculty Row," long the home of Herman Halladay, is being converted into an administration building for the education and psychology departments.

The brick dwelling occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Halladay, known as "No. 7, Faculty Row," is 79 years old and had been occupied by prominent college officials for 77 years.

When a ruling was passed that no professors could live on the campus it was January 1, 1928, that Mr. Halladay moved into No. 7.

Negro Tenor Would Be Scientific Farmer

Artist to the core in everything, however, Hayes could not be satisfied with the primitive farming of his childhood. He set out to make the farming operations of his maturity as much of an improvement over the farming of his boyhood as his concert singing became an improvement over his boyhood vocalism.

As a scientific farmer, Mr. Hayes has progressed far enough to have made a truck garden of the backyard of his Boston home, from which he supplied all the fresh vegetables for his own table this summer.

Roland Hayes shares his hobby time with horseback riding. He is convinced as a singer he should apply himself to keeping in good physical as well as vocal trim. So he rides all he possibly can, recharges mentally in the saddle if the spirit moves him, and returns to practice and study with fresh interest and a voice supported by an inexhaustible supply of breath.

In all seriousness, Roland Hayes reveals an artistic trait in that he will not sing a song in public, not even the work of a master composer, until he has "lived with it" for an extended period.

Mr. Hayes is on the search for classic gems, and modern ones, too, which have not been "done to death." He numbers in his music library early and comparatively little-known editions from many countries, showing a greater variety of selections from the masters than the familiar, standard collections.

The distinguished Negro tenor does not entirely desert vocal exercises in preparing his songs, but he sets more store by repeating excerpts from songs he has under consideration for addition to his already vast repertoire.
