Don't Snatch Objects from Baby's Grasp

Don't affront your baby by snatching things from him. If you've been doing this, just stop and consider his hands. Little fat starfish hands or slen der, fragile looking ones - they're the open sesame to the world he's born into. They're more than just that part of his anatomy; they're wonderful, sensitive instruments for him to use in learning to live. For that reason I dislike seeing a mother snatch something from her baby's hand or use her strength to unclasp his firm little grip on something he wants and intends to keep. It is possible to bring a child thru his babyhood and little childhood without ever taking from him forcibly the things he shouldn't This is not theory; I have proof of it.

The way you get a baby to part with the thing he is grasping and wants, but must not have, is important. It's important in its effect on him. And it is a symbol of your attitude toward him.

It's important, for one thing, be cause it draws the contrast between force and intelligence. Just watch a baby when he's being forcibly deprived of something. See his face get red with anger or resistance treatment and quick to sense your inches high. The hot iron transfer face out of the papers is to ask forbidden object.
