Graphic Section

Chicago Sunday Cribune world's greatest newspaper

Camera News Review

December 3, 1933

By John Herrick

OOSOCRACY has dawned on these United States of America. Nine months of the New Deal have defined it clearly in the minds of the students of government. As they see it now it is no longer merely another passing around of the same old pasteboards. It is a New Deck, with the chief requirement for participation a willingness to abide by the New Rules. He who will play Follow the Dealer is welcomed regardless of past alliances.

The old Democracy of the Jeffersonians has been sidetracked by hope for a monocracy, toward the building of which the aid of leaders of New Thought in Government is openly solicited. In the eyes of authority there is no longer any left wing of either party. The leftists are being brought together on common ground.

THE DYNASTIC ROOSEVELTS AND ROOSOCRATIC PARTY

This, say the scholars, is the peak sought for the House of Roosevelt, a dynasty that for years has made its imprint on the pages of American history. The lineage has been broken, but the grade school pupil knows of the heights-reached by the T. R. branch of the family and is beginning to realize those sought by FDR, father of the NRA, the PWA,

Because of the trend of the times at the White House, students of great problems, the wise men of the day, have been harking back to the early days of the Roosevelts since the time somewhere in the sixteen-forties when a little sailing ship brought to New Amsterdam Claes Martenzen van Roosevelt and Jannetje Samuels Thomas van Roosevelt, his wife. That was the founding of the American dynasty that produced two Presidents of the United States, one the advocate of the Square Deal, the other the proponent of the New Deal. Both branches are active in American life today. A few months ago, when there was an overlapping of Republican and Democratic regimes, no fewer than four Roosevelts held high federal office. One was the President. Another was governor of the Philippines. Others held posts as assistant secretary of (Continued on Page Four.)