Poor Richard Said: "Work Hard,"

And he practised what he preached. He worked hard not only to build a fortune, but to build a CHARACTER, which he considered more worth while. A little selfdenial now and then helped him to do both.

Saving, he argued, makes a man independent enables a man to do things. So in his homely way he preached thrift constantly.

Be Just, Save Something.

The sound principles of thrift and getting ahead in he world have not changed since Franklin's time any more than human nature has. Conditions have changed. The cost of living is higher, but so are wages. On the whole, the chances of the thrifty person today are better than they were then, when there were no savings banks paying 3 per cent. compound interest on savings.

It chanced that once upon a time remote, The weary giant, known as Labor, smote His thigh a sounding whack and cried, "I'm blest, But I have toiled enough and now I'll rest. I'll let the world wag onward as it may, While I so home and have my holiday. So, Labor laid aside his tools and crept Deep in his cavern, where he promptly slept.

An hour went by, an hour without a sound, The shops were stilled, no more their wheels went'round, The mills were fastened close with bolt and lock. The steamship idly rubbed against her dock, The engine moveless slept, the anvil stood As silent as a gravestone in a wood. While Mankind, startled by the awful still,

Together whispered, awed, "Is Labor ill?" And as the moments passed o'er town and farm, And all was still, there 'rose a great alarm, Went forth the giant Commerce, loud to shout, Deep into Labor's cavern, "Friend, come out, You're needed by us-needed in a trice. Please come at once! We'll pay you any price. You've slept an hour already—all your fill.

Come forth at once. The world is standing still." And Labor, wakened by the other's cries, Stretched forth his brawny arms and rubbed his eyes, And mused a bit, then with good-natured smile, Said. "Yes, I'll come, but make it worth my while. One day each year you'll give me privilege free, One day each year you'll consecrate to me,

While one day I will consecrate to play, And (chuckling, said), we'll call it Labor Day."
