Michigan School Head Interviewed
The greatest change this year in the Michigan education pattern will be at the high school level, said Dr. Lee M. Thurston, state superintendent of public instruction, in an interview with the "Michigan Mirror."
Public schools are experiencing a boom. With $140 million of state aid to school districts and teacher retirement, Michigan public schools this year have more classrooms, more pupils, better paid teachers and more building construction.
In the opinion of Dr. Thurston, "head man" for our school system, the new college graduate program for high schools is of utmost significance. Through this plan local high schools will be able to offer courses in agriculture, mechanics, home economics, and other practical subjects. This will help students to gain college entrance.
