open invitation to other moles, who will soon take residence and perhaps even improve and enlarge the run.

Before carrying out treatment a thorough inspection of the whole area is recommended, paying particular attention to surrounding copses for signs of mole activity and, if found, these areas should also be treated.

The damage caused to golf courses and greens by rabbits grazing and burrowing will be all too familiar. Resistance to myxomatosis, coupled with the fact that weaker strains of the myxoma virus are now replacing the more virulent strains, means that the rabbit has once again become a major pest.

Rabbits breed from January to June, and a female rabbit born early in the year will be capable of producing litters herself in the same year! An adult will rear two to four litters each year, with each litter consisting of three to six young. After three to four weeks the young will have been weaned and be capable of finding their own food.

Phostoxin is just as effective against rabbits and works in exactly the same way. As with mole control, the best time to control rabbits is from October to February. The rabbit population will be at its lowest at this time and burrow entrances will be easier to locate amongst the sparser vegetation.

While it is an offence under the protection of Animals Act 1911 to lay poisoned baits for rabbits, the use of poisonous gas in rabbit warrens is permitted under the Prevention of Damage by Rabbits Act 1939.

To carry out treatment, a thorough inspection of the site is necessary. Any rabbits lying out should be driven to ground before commencing operations. One phostoxin tablet should then be placed 13 inches into each burrow entrance and the entrance sealed by cutting a turf and placing this, grass side down, over the entrance, and heeling in. Care should be taken to ensure earth does not cover the tablet when sealing the entrance, as this can reduce the rate at which the gas is evolved.

After 48 hours the site should be re-inspected and any burrow entrance that has been reopened should be treated again.

For more information and a free instruction leaflet please write to Peter Barrett at Rentokil Ltd, Felcourt, East Grinstead, West Sussex, RH19 2JY or ring (0342) 833022.
