persons who have sufficient experience or knowledge to undertake the measures necessary to comply with the provisions. Is this true at your course? If not, who is the necessary competent named individual? Is that individual's name written down in the record?

Q3: Regulation 7 (2) Ditto: Every employer shall, without prejudice – b) enable the persons concerned (if necessary by taking appropriate steps in the absence of guidance or instruction and in the light of their knowledge and the technical means at their disposal) to stop work and immediately proceed to a place of safety in the event of their being exposed to serious, imminent and avoidable danger. The key word is immediately. Are your procedures capable of immediate reaction?

Q4: Noise at Work. Noise guide No 1. The first level is set at 85 decibels. Determination of a machine's output can be made by carrying out the following: do not continue the test for longer than two minutes, as hearing damage may occur if personnel are exposed without adequate protection!

a) Ensure that the machine is parked safely. b) Only use trained and correctly attired personnel in the test. c) Check the area is clear of any debris or other contagion. d) Start the machine. e) Run at full throttle and with due caution attempt to carry out a conversation with the operator. f) Can you hear what is said using normal voice projection? Yes – the machine is operating on or below the noise level. No – the machine is operating above the minimum level and ear protection must be provided, training given in its use and operators instructed to wear it.

Lost opportunity

It was with increasing dismay that I read the thinly veiled advertisement (article) "Lock It Up". What a lost opportunity to address some important points to ensure yard buildings are constructed in accordance with modern thinking, not to mention the new EC/HSE legislative framework!

Employers reading the article will be tempted to construct 'sheds' in the same old way – as I find so depressingly often on my rounds. May I appeal to all involved in the design and construction of yard buildings to bear in mind two vitally important matters:

1) Where employees are gathered within a building for any length of time eg. workshops, rest areas etc., there must be a safe means of rapidly escaping in the event of an emergency such as a fire. Building such rooms within a 'shed' with security only in mind (no doors or windows) amounts to nothing less than a death trap. The collection of machinery and small tools in the main storage area frequently make it very difficult to get out in a hurry. Very often too the source of a fire will be a hot machine just parked right in front of the most obvious means of escape. Modern design and materials can ensure that the construction of doors and windows will give security as well as safety.

2) Little thought is given to the relationship between pesticides, oil or petrol stores, workshops and rest areas. It is not unusual to find new buildings with such stores right next to areas where employees are working or at rest. Add to this the fact that there are no external exits and you have an accident waiting to happen. There is plenty of guidance available to builders and designers to help them avoid disaster, but I wonder if they ever read them?

Too many mistakes are being made in yard building design which employees have to live with. It is a pity that Inspectors do not pay more attention to this important aspect of health and safety at work. A few well placed Improvement Notices might go a long way towards getting the message across.

I would appeal to all involved in the provision of yard buildings: make health and safety one of the first things you think about, don't leave it to the end user, the employee, to worry about!

Is this a first?

I have a brother, a brother-in-law, a cousin and an uncle, all greenkeepers at various courses, all of whom thoroughly enjoy their work. John Phillips, the uncle of this group, until recently worked at The Broom Hill G&CC in Vancouver Island, Canada. I say until recently, because during June 1993 he suffered a fatal accident, involving a tractor.

Our family were, of course, saddened by the tragedy and by our loss, but it has come to light that we were not alone, for the golf club where he worked thought so much of his work – and of John as a person – that they have re-named their club in memory of him. The new name is The John Phillips Memorial Golf Club. Each September a competition will be played in his honour.

We are all very proud of this and many of our golf-playing family hope to one day visit Vancouver Island to play in the competition with members of the club, an honour indeed.

I wonder, is this a first for greenkeepers?

Tree grants available

May I draw to the attention of readers the large grants that are now available from the Forestry Authority for tree planting? These grants are available to all land owners, including golf courses, and are paid out under a Woodland Grant Scheme over a period of ten years. There is also a supplement for planting improved grassland, which is paid out at the time of planting.

We recently prepared a budget for tree planting in 15 different areas on a golf course and over a ten year period the grants will cover the total cost of the tree planting and subsequent maintenance.

Course is right on target

I would like to thank all the staff at BIGGA and all the lecturers for a most interesting and enjoyable week on your Year One Management Course. I found it of great benefit and will be looking forward to coming back for Year Two. If any greenkeeper is thinking of going on the course, I would thoroughly recommend it. Thanks again for a great week.

Wrong hills

Bidding a fond farewell

My time on Greenkeeper International is finished, to my regret if not to yours. Looking back over the small mountain of issues it has been my pleasure to compile, I grinned at one comment which appeared in my first editorial, recalling again the pithy words of an unidentified but oh-so-observant wordsmith: "Writing a column is easy," he declared, "All you have to do is sit at your typewriter until small drops of blood appear on your forehead."

Thirty five issues have come and gone, some with more blood-letting than others, and though occasions were legion when "small drops of blood appeared on my forehead" it seemed, more often than not, that blood appeared on my fingertips as well, for the equivalent of something approaching two block-buster novels has been thumped out on the keyboard of my trusty old Apple Macintosh; far more than any trifling 'bloody' column and, in truth, much more fun.

Editorial guess-work is at best an imperfect science. In trying to discover where readers' loyalties may lie, I've found no reliable way of discovering which elements in this magazine you've secretly pined to read – or those you'd be pleased to see the back of – while any 'research' I might have undertaken (in the main, listening to every greenkeeper I ever chanced to button-hole for more than a few moments) – served merely to offer guide-lines to those features you most enjoyed (without exception, the controversial ones), whilst failing to throw up any revolutionary or untried ideas.

Striving always to present all sides of the greenkeeping conundrum, often at no small cost to my firm (some would say impenitent) beliefs, in so doing I've held true to the doctrine of John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), whose words are writ large above my computer screen: "We can never be sure that the opinion we are endeavouring to stifle is a false opinion; and if we are sure, stifling it would be an evil still."

My departure should not alter your expectation of good things to come, for a tantalising array of delectables will I am sure continue to appear within these comfortable old pages, pages that I have come to regard as my own. There will be words that please and words that infuriate, words that inspire and words that are best read with a sharp instrument close at hand. If you think you are being addressed in a condescending manner, or you suspect pontification, grasp the matter firmly: your letters page was never dull, make sure it stays that way.

So farewell. Be of good cheer, trusted friends – and be kind to your new editor. This old editor cum columnist cum photographer cum copy boy isn't about to kick the bucket, he's simply taking a well earned blood transfusion. The drip is deep in the artery, the bottle flowing with a translucent amber fluid that contains reputedly miraculous healing powers!
