BADGERS

Droppings are to be found in shallow pits dug in the grass. Dung pits are territorial markers and can usually be located along hedges or woodland areas, rather than on the main parts of the course.

Badgers typically cause damage when digging for food, when they can even roll turf back like a carpet to gain food. They can weight up to 16kg and live in social groups of up to six animals. Setts are continually dug during the year, but are more frequently noticeable at the peak times of February-April and August.

Management is complex as the animal and their setts are protected by law. It is best to gain expert advice, although electric fencing can be effective to protect parts of the course. However, it is illegal to position these fences around a sett.
