HAZEL

The bark is shiny grey and generally smooth, becoming scaly with supporting curled strips and horizontal breathing pores. Hazel produces large broadest at the base, giving way to a projected point at the tip. Each leaf is coarsely toothed with unequal teeth. Leaves are generally dark green in colour supporting soft, white hairs on the underside veins.

With regard to fruit, male catkins produced through winter. Female flowers forming red protruding tassels occur in mid February after pollen of same tree is shed. Nuts are often clustered and protected by overlapping bracts.

Hazel is easily recognised by its small size, usually less than 8 metres, its position in a woodland or hedgerow. It is an understorey component, often growing from the base to form long branches.
