AIR-WATER RATIO IN PRESSURE TANKS

The time will soon be with use when it will be necessary to put pumping plants and irrigation systems into operation. For those who have automatic pumping plants incorporating a pressure tank it is suggested that the air-water ratio in the tank be 60½ air and 40% water. This ratio permits the pump to operate within the desired pressure limits.

To obtain the above air-water ratio it is suggested that WHILE THE TANK IS STILL EMPTY the air compressor be started and the air pressure in the tank raised to 60% of the regular operating pressure of the system. For example, if the system operating pressure is 100 lbs., then the air pressure in the tank should be raised to 60 lbs., i.e. 100 x 0.60.

After the tank is charged with the correct air pressure, as indicated above, the compressor can be stopped and the water pump started, when the tank becomes 40% filled with water it will be noted that the correct water working pressure has been reached. In other words the original air in the tank has been compressed into 60% of its former volume by the water and the pressure rises accordingly.
