 getting more specialized equipment, dealing with the trend of smaller fairways.

"Superintendents are maintaining fairways almost to the level of the greens," he said.

The greens conditioner has been the major innovation of the late 1980s and, since Jacobsen introduced the first model two years ago, others in the industry have followed suit with their own versions.

Byrnes added that crucial factors today are quality of cut and a machine's weight and durability.

But he pointed out that "what's exciting one place is not another. In the South you have sandy soil, Bermuda grass, and they're not concerned about weight. But high-rainfall areas would be concerned about weight.

"Also, the public course as opposed to the private might call for different equipment, such as a private using a three- or five-gang to cut one-half inch or less and for striping."
