Talking It Over

Mid-West Volunteers Valuable Greens Help contribution been made to the cause of better course maintenance, providing the golf clubs to which the service is available will take advantage of it in the same earnest manner in which the service is tendered.

We have difficulty in calling to mind any other business that could, and would, send out some if its foremost authorities to determine and remove operating difficulties, and make a charge that represents only bare expenses and not a cent for the valuable and authoritative knowledge brought into play. The Mid-West association deserves the highest commendation for its new plan. The plan means more work for the volunteer experts to whom "union hours" now run the length of a farmer's laboring day, but the added responsibilities have been willingly accepted. The Mid-West men are going at this new proposition in their usual energetic fashion, with the enthusiasm of crusaders for better and thriftier maintenance of perfect course conditions. We have wondered if green-chairmen give these fellows due credit for their idealism. When the greenkeepers meet there is a lack of that air of eat (if absolutely necessary), drink and make merry that is so evident at many business conventions. The greenkeepers mean and act business. They want every course to be perfect, and after that perfection is achieved they may think of their own monetary reward for the work, but the great national game of "getting theirs" doesn't seem to bother them much.

That may be a handicap to this new plan the Mid-West association announces. There are some who don't realize or appreciate the extent to which good greenkeepers will go "for the good of the game." These unknowing ones will under-estimate the value of the service because it is gratuitously given and thus will deny their clubs the benefits of one of the most important helps that has been offered to golf. The almost complete lack of selling force in the makeup of even the greatest of greenkeepers means that probably there will be just the announcement of the consulting and advisory service, and no persistent follow-up. However, the announcement alone should be enough as revealing the location of ready rescuers when a brother greenkeeper or green-chairman sends out an S. O. S.

Department Meetings Promote Smooth Operating

Meetings of department heads of commercial establishments are more or less customary and successful, but such cases are rare in golf club management.

We ran across a case recently of a club where the president and committee chairmen meet twice a month during the season with the manager, greenkeeper and professional. These sessions, so the club president told
