It's Pros's Job to Keep Golf Alive Thru War

By GEORGE R. JACOBUS

Professionals have a great responsibility to keep the game of golf alive. It is possible to be optimistic and still be aware of what is taking place in the world. I have heard more pessimistic remarks by professionals than by amateur golfers. Golf has a definite place in this war effort. There seems to be a good deal of effort stressed by our government to find ways and means of recreation for the workers. How about the executives? Their recreation and the benefits of it will be reflected in their industries and the companies they represent? It can't help but be reflected. The professionals will have to band together and show the importance of golf. Men don't have to play four or five days a week but they must get out of doors and enjoy the sun and air as some do their sports. Why shouldn't the business man, as well as the working man, be considered in this war effort without feeling that he is doing something wrong—something that will reflect on him? He is building his body, safe-guarding his mental stability and keeping his spirit the way he should to carry out his responsibilities.

I would like to see professionals make it a point to play with as many members as they can, and these games should be played on the basis of friendship—not gambling—and with no charge for it. We must do our part, supply our members with their golfing needs and let them know we will be able to keep up the supply of golf balls, new or rebuilt. Every member should be notified that the pro is equipped to take care of his needs. The managers are doing it and the professionals should. They should train caddies, build them up, give them lessons and get them interested so they will be interested in caddying; then we can get them more easily. We know that once the bug bites them we don't have to beg them to caddie.

WPB Stops Production of Club Repair Parts
