Some of the larger corporations, moving to smaller communities, are building their own courses in order to attract and hold desirable young executives and workers who, with their families, insist on adequate recreational facilities. The Air Force would show great foresight in taking a page from the book of these industrialists by building golf courses on air bases throughout the world.

This article has been condensed from a speech by Bud Werring to Special Service officers of the Strategic Air Command at a conference last fall.
