Foundation Gives Optimistic Report on Course Growth

The 5686 golf courses in operation as of Apr. 1 represent a new post-war high, according to the semi-annual report of the National Golf Foundation, Joe Graffis, Foundation pres., said 41 new golf courses and seven additions to existing courses were put into play in the last six months.

A total of 267 new courses and 73 additions are now under construction. This compares with 255 courses and 64 additions a year ago. Of the new construction, 77 courses and 14 additions (ranging from 4 to 18 holes) were started in the last six months. During that same six-month period, the Foundation received 164 requests for help in planning and organizing new course projects — only two less than it received in the 12 month period from Oct. 1956, to Oct. 1957!

Highly significant, said Graffis, is the steady increase in course projects in the planning stage. This amounts to 892, up 134 from last Oct.

There has been a steady growth of course-real estate development projects in which the course is an integral feature of the over-all community plan.
