KNOW THE DIFFERENCE

time organizing his buying program, he would need less time making his sales. If a pro doesn't buy the right items at the right price in the right style for his particular clientele, the items will be very difficult to sell, no matter how good a sales staff he has.

Municipal course

In the past, the municipal operator catered to the middle-to-lower-income person and had to stock the type of merchandise his customer could afford. He usually stayed with low-end items. Increased affluence and leisure time, however, have allowed the municipal operator to provide the full spectrum of prices because his customers who can now afford the very best merchandise do, in fact, insist on quality lines. However, the municipal operator may continue to do most of his sales in the lower price ranges and he must remember to concentrate his buying accordingly.

Many of his customers are beginners because, generally, the municipal course is where the fundamentals of the game are learned. These beginning golfers always want to buy something that promises to improve their game.

Club repair, once a declining art, has come back with the advent of the easy-to-apply one-piece grips, and profits from this area can be quite substantial.

Resort course

The person who plays on a resort course is usually on vacation and he is more likely to spend an extra dollar for items he would not ordinarily buy. Selling time is short, usually from one day to two weeks. If a resort operator does not have the merchandise in stock, in the size and color the vacationer wants, the sale is lost. Special orders are out of the question because of the time element.

Quite often, the resort areas are seasonal. Special sales become an important part of his merchandising program. It wastes money to carry large stocks of summer merchandise through the winter. The chances of damaging them is high and styles change from year to year. It is vitally important then to start clearance sales early.

Private club

The private country club professional has one great advantage over the other two types of course operators: He knows his membership and their habits. He can buy specific items for specific customers and be reasonably sure they will sell. During the year, country clubs usually hold many golfing events for which the club professional in most cases provides the prizes. This can be a sizeable account.

In every type of golf shop operation, special promotions and holidays are very important. Most downtown retail stores use these special days to launch sales and promotions. Mother's Day and Father's Day are two of the best promotion periods. Promoting both holidays should start at least two weeks ahead of time with signs and displays. Let your whole shop reflect the theme. Have your sales personnel promote the holiday at every opportunity. Send a card to the members announcing the promotion and list a few of the more attractive items available.

Most people are always looking for an unusual birthday gift and for the golfer, a golfing item is just perfect. This can be a year-round promotion.

Regardless of the type of shop you operate—municipal, resort or private—if you have not bought well and if your selling techniques are not the best, you still have one possible last resort, service. Service is the most important single phase of any operation and can, in fact, does, overcome many shortcomings. Good service will not remedy all bad buys, but it will go a long way toward establishing good customer relations. □
