Once again another golfing season is upon us. Many of us are happy that summer is almost here. This past winter saw many records set in both lack of snow-fall and very low temperatures. Now that winter is over many of you are facing challenges in returning your turf to a playable condition and evaluating the long-term effects of this past winter. Around the entire state of Wisconsin, there has been an abundance of injured turf caused from both desiccation and crown hydration. Over the past month, the soil temperatures and the soil moisture have been slowly getting back to normal. With everything getting back to normal, the injured turf is healing nicely. It always amazes me that no matter how slow things are to come around golf courses always seem to look good once we get into June.
