Spring is right around the corner, and it's time to see just how the Calc-clor substitutes did, but then I wouldn't have used any of the substitutes unless the data were there from MGCSA Research. Research is so very important in our seasonal drive to maintain our golf courses in excellent shape, but also to provide a sound environmental program. After all, we are stewards of the environment.

Last year money was extremely tight at my club (something to do with all that extra precipitation and the golf course being closed). However, there has to be a way for my club to contribute to the MGCSA Research Fund. I feel very strongly about this. So, in discussing this with some real close personal friends last July, it was brought out that it is the golfers who really do benefit from all the research that is going on. Therefore, why not get the donation from greens fees? That's the club's money, and it really is important to keep that allocation where it belongs.

Another direction was to approach the Golf Committee Chair and inform him as to what research does for the golfer, propose getting a donation from handicap fees charged by the club and earmark a percentage to MGCSA Research. Well, in December, when all the fees were set for the upcoming year, the Golf Committee recommended and the Faribault Golf & Country Club Board approved that 50¢ from each golfer's handicap will go towards the MGCSA Research Fund.

Can you give golfers at your club too much information? How do you address your golfers as to when your going to aerify, topdress or apply plant protectant.

The idea of communicating with a golfer is not a new one. There's nothing worse than to find out that topdressing of greens is to take place on the same day as a charity scramble. Communication starts with weekly staff meetings so that the Golf Course Manager is informed of what is coming up as far as outings or outside tournaments. Then we arrange our maintenance schedules to prepare for the upcoming week, month and year.

Now comes the tricky part—how to keep the golfers informed as to what we do. At many clubs there is a bulletin board set up right outside the golf shop to keep golfers informed about tournaments and other pertinent activities. Of course, a letter from the Golf Course Manager about maintenance activities, attainable goals for the season, what to look for on the golf course is always welcome on that bulletin board.

Remember, when writing these letters, you must be able to speak lay-man-ese; getting too technical can sometimes turn golfers off.

Another route of communications is the club's monthly newsletter, where a page can be turned into a medium for the members' information; again, write the message so that it's very easy to understand. Doing this once a month during the year can really help members understand what is going on out on the golf course and inside the maintenance facility.

Another GCSAA Annual Conference has come and gone. What was accomplished? It seems that with the new management team of Steve Mona, CEO, Julian Arredondo, CFO and Joe O'Brien as COO, that co-operation between the membership and the home office in Lawrence Kansas will be much improved. It is nice to know that when you call the GCSAA and leave a message, the message will be returned. This could be the start of something big.

The MGCSA's Annual Conference produced the MGCSA quite the profit. The expenses were way below the projections. Some speakers did not charge anything, and parking passes that were not used by many members. Now what is going to happen with this profit? Starting with the March Seminar, more money will be made available to get speakers that are not only better, but offer more education in areas that is extremely specialized. Also we probably will see education returning to our MGCSA monthly meetings. Continuing education is one of the many membership services that the MGCSA offers its members.

During the MGCSA Annual Conference a survey was handed out to the 300+ members that were in attendance. The number of surveys returned was 68. Of these returned surveys 82% felt that the Convention Center fit the needs of the MGCSA. 92% approved of the concurrent sessions and would like to see them continued for 1994. Multiple comments ranged from having Rod Ferrentino and Frank Rossi to talking to Butch at the registration desk. Comments on what to do to improve the Conference included supplying coffee and pastries between breaks to providing note paper. If you have ideas or comments, John Granholt, Superintendent at Eau Claire C.C. is chairing the Conference and Education Committee. Please make him aware of your concerns.
