KEEP TRYING

On December 11, 1970 the following letter was written to the two Sports Columnists in the Washington area:

As superintendents in the Washington area experiencing more rounds of golf each year, we can only realize the misconception by the average golfer of what we do in our never ending fight against humans versus grass. The golf course superintendent is somewhat to blame because some of the education of the golfing public does fall on our shoulders.

We are a professional group, proud of our accomplishments of growing turf under the most adverse conditions, but there are few professions that exist that are as abused as ours through a round of golf.

How can we educate the golfer? Nationally televised golf tournaments over the past few years have given an inroad to make people aware of our job, but more publicity is needed.

You and other sports writers could help through your weekly columns by relating these problems to the golfing public.
