The Cover

At turf level, most ryegrasses take on the frazzled, frayed look of the blade on the right of this month's cover. Now science and nature have developed a new fine-leaved perennial ryegrass that takes a clean cut as shown in the blade on the left. This ryegrass is called Pennfine. Note the distinct differences between the two blades. Multiply the blade on the right by all the blades in a turf and the result is a faded, weathered look that often provides too much cushion for a golf ball. The blade on the left will hold a ball erect and at eye-level give a pleasing green appearance.
