scheme."

The Supreme Court decision, which ruled that states and local communities across the country had the right to draft and pass their own pesticide laws, resulted in the CSPP's formation.

The National Agricultural Chemicals Association (NACA) was its prime mover. Individual associations on the membership roster of the CSPP include NACA, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Professional Lawn Care Association of America, the National Pest Control Association, the Chemical Manufacturer's Association, the Chemical Specialty Manufacturer's Association, the Chemical Producers and Distributors Association, and Responsible Industry for a Sound Environment (RISE).

One of the most organized and influential groups in the green industry—the Golf Course Superintendents Association of America (GCSAA)—is not on the CSPP's membership roster, but could be in the future. At the GCSAA's quarterly Board of Directors meeting later this month, involvement with CSPP is an agenda item.

Already, help has been offered to lawn care operators in Missoula, Mont., and other areas where local regulations have become stifling to business.

According to CSPP members, the organization's primary purposes are two-fold:

1) to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) to provide clear language on pre-emption of local regulations; and

2) to work at the state level to provide clear language on pre-emption of local regulations.

"The bulk of the work is yet to come," notes Steve Russell, assistant general counsel to NACA. "We have, however, drafted technical amendments to FIFRA which we feel will go a long way in clearing things up."

If you have heard rumblings in your community about possible local pesticide legislation, you are urged to write the National Pest Control Association's Government Affairs Dept., 8100 Oak St., Dunn Loring, VA 2202, or fax messages to (703) 204-2271.

State ag departments prefer FIFRA

■ The National Association of State Departments of Agriculture (NASDA) has issued a position statement endorsing the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) as its preferred method of pesticide regulation.

"The regulation of pesticides at the federal and state levels of government has proven to be a very effective means in which to administer this important program," says the NASDA, which believes that municipal regulation will "greatly impede the coordinated and orderly federal and state regulatory framework already in place."

The NASDA also urges states to enact legislation pre-empting local regulation of pesticides.

End-user groups: Divided or united?

■ Two user groups form the core of the green industry's campaign for fair pesticide legislation: the manufacturer's group, Responsible Industry for a Sound Environment (RISE), and the applicator's group, the Professional Lawn Care Association of America (PLCAA).

Both groups want more applicator training, and are working together to finalize a national program. The two disagree, however, on the issue of homeowner responsibility for posting and notification. PLCAA wants it, RISE does not.

"Our concern is with an organization going outside its own industry trying to regulate the homeowner," says Dr. Dave Duncan, RISE's issues chairman. Duncan admits that manufacturers do not want to work counter to LCO desires, but that "we will if we have to."

Ann McClure, executive vice president of the PLCAA, says the issue will eventually be resolved. But for now, says McClure,
